We are asked to assign any rational motive for the conduct imputed to the respondent. His object might have been to court the Administration which he upheld and supported, to recommend himself to the President of the United States, to obtain the Chief Justiceship. Those who are anxious to attract the notice and favor of the powers that be, are not apt to put their light under a bushel. The fulsomeness of sycophants, who always overact their part, is proverbial. Sir, he might be aspiring to the Presidency itself, and anxious to engage the favor of the leaders of his party. Let it be remembered, the triumph of that day was complete, and the reckoning of this day too remote from probability to be taken into the account. Here, sir, you have a key to his whole conduct. It becomes you, then, Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate, to determine whether a man whose whole judicial life hath been marked by habitual outrage upon decorum and duty, too inveterate to give the least hope of reformation, interwoven and incorporated with his very nature, shall be arrested in his career, or again let loose upon society, to prey upon the property, liberty, and life of those who will not rally around his political standard. We have performed our duty; we have bound the criminal and dragged him to your altar. The nation expects from you that award which the evidence and the law requires. It remains for you to say whether he shall again become the scourge of an exasperated people, or whether he shall stand as a landmark and a beacon to the present generation, and a warning to the future, that no talents, however great, no age, however venerable, no character, however sacred, no connexions, however influential, shall save that man from the justice of his country, who prostitutes the best gifts of Nature and of God, and the power with which he is invested for the general good, to the low purposes of an electioneering partisan. We adjure you, on behalf of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to exorcise from our courts the baleful spirit of party, to give an awful memento to our judges. In the name of the nation, I demand at your hands the award of justice and of law.

MR. HARPER.—I beg leave, Mr. President, to correct the honorable gentleman who has just concluded, (MR. RANDOLPH,) with respect to what he has called admissions on our part; and to notice a little the authority which he has read respecting Chief Justice Keelyng.

THE PRESIDENT observed that it would be necessary for Mr. HARPER to confine himself to the facts which he considered misstated.

MR. HARPER. The honorable gentleman has stated that we admitted our client to be guilty. I disclaim and deny any such admission. Had we made it, we should have admitted what is not true. We did, indeed, admit, that our client has been guilty of some casual indiscretions, such as are common to every man; but we neither did or could admit more.

The honorable gentleman is also incorrect, in his manner of stating John Heath's testimony. John Heath did positively swear, that he told the circumstances to Mr. Holmes, within an hour after the conversation in his presence took place, between the respondent and the marshal.

The honorable gentleman has also said, that I compared the conduct of my client, to a brawl or a riot. This is an utter mistake. I said no such thing. I made no such comparison.

The PRESIDENT here checked Mr. HARPER, who was apparently entering into an argument.

Mr. HARPER. I will confine myself to saying the remark of the honorable gentleman is a mistake. As to the authority cited by the honorable gentleman from Hatsell, to show that Sir John Keelyng was a man of worthless character, whose writings are not entitled to credit; it does, indeed, appear from Hatsell, that Sir John Keelyng, while Chief Justice of England, was cited to appear before the House of Commons, upon charges exhibited against him. But what was the result? The honorable gentleman has omitted to inform us. But had he proceeded to read the next sentence in the book, he would have found that Sir John Keelyng appeared to the summons, made his defence, and was most honorably acquitted. It was a light, vague, and groundless accusation, which met with the fate that ought ever to attend such accusations, and that I hope will attend the present.

The honorable gentleman has also discovered, that the decisions reported by Sir John Keelyng, which were cited by my learned colleague, were Star Chamber decisions; and he has indulged himself in repeating many of the usual invectives, against Star Chamber proceedings, and Star Chamber decisions. But where did he find that these decisions were made in the Star Chamber? If he had taken the trouble to read the book, which together with its author, he has so much stigmatized, he would have found that these decisions were made, not in the Star Chamber, but in the Court of King's Bench; which was at that time filled by some of the ablest lawyers that England has ever produced. If he will take the trouble to open the learned work of Hale on the criminal law—of Hale whom he and his colleagues have so much and so justly extolled, and whose eulogium is a perpetual theme in every court of criminal jurisdiction—if he will turn to Hawkins, the leading authority and constant manual of criminal law; he will find that Keelyng's reports are constantly cited as authority, by those learned writers; and that the very decisions cited by my learned colleague, which have so strongly excited the indignation of the honorable gentleman himself, are at this moment considered as the established law of England; and consequently for this country, so far as they apply.

The latitude allowed by this honorable Court, would admit of my correcting many other mistakes of minor importance, into which the honorable gentleman has fallen: but the lateness of the hour, and an anxious wish to bring the trial to a close, admonish me to abstain from any further remarks.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he hoped that until tomorrow would be allowed the gentleman to make any further observations he might be desirous to offer. Mr. HARPER having declined saying anything more, the President informed Mr. R. that he was at liberty to reply to Mr. HARPER.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Sir, I did not say that Keelyng was Star Chamber authority; I expressly stated that he was Chief Justice of the King's Bench. At the time of his impeachment the Court of High Commission and Star Chamber had been abolished forty years. But I did aver (and I repeat the assertion) that Star Chamber authorities had been adduced to justify the conduct of the respondent. Keelyng was impeached for innovation in trials of men for their lives, and putting unlawful restraints on juries. It is true, sir, the Commons dropped their prosecution, but what does that prove? Surely not even his own innocence, much less that of the respondent. If we have not made out our case, if we are not fully supported by the law and the evidence, you will acquit the accused, not by a scanty and frigid majority, but by an unanimous vote. If we have not proved the truth of our charge, on us, and on all the people of America, who cry aloud against him, be the shame. Let us be dismissed to infamy, and hosannas be sung to him whom the highest tribunal of the nation delighteth to honor.

On motion of Mr. JACKSON.

Resolved, That the Court will on Friday next, at 12 o'clock, pronounce judgment in the case of Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

FRIDAY, March 1.

The Court being opened by proclamation, the Managers, accompanied by the House of Representatives, attended.

The counsel for the respondent also attended.

The consideration of the motion, made yesterday for an alteration of one of the rules in cases of impeachments, was resumed: Whereupon,

Resolved, That in taking the judgment of the Senate upon the articles of impeachment now depending against Samuel Chase, Esq., the President of the Senate shall call on each member by his name, and upon each article, propose the following question, in the manner following: "Mr. — how say you; is the respondent, Samuel Chase, guilty or not guilty of a high crime or misdemeanor, as charged in the — article of impeachment?"

Whereupon, each member shall rise in his place, and answer guilty or not guilty.

The PRESIDENT rose, and addressing himself to the members of the Court, said:

Gentlemen: You have heard the evidence and arguments adduced on the trial of Samuel Chase, impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors: you will now proceed to pronounce distinctly your judgment on each article.

The Secretary then read the first article of impeachment, as follows:

ARTICLE 1. That, unmindful of the solemn duties of his office, and contrary to the sacred obligation by which he stood bound to discharge them "faithfully and impartially, and without respect to persons," the said Samuel Chase, on the trial of John Fries, charged with treason, before the circuit court of the United States, held for the district of Pennsylvania, in the city of Philadelphia, during the months of April and May, one thousand eight hundred, whereat the said Samuel Chase presided, did, in his judicial capacity, conduct himself in a manner highly arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust, viz:

1. In delivering an opinion, in writing, on the question of law, on the construction of which the defence of the accused materially depended, tending to prejudice the minds of the jury against the case of the said John Fries, the prisoner, before counsel had been heard in his defence:

2. In restricting the counsel for the said Fries from recurring to such English authorities as they believed apposite, or from citing certain statutes of the United States, which they deemed illustrative of the positions upon which they intended to rest the defence of their client:

3. In debarring the prisoner from his Constitutional privilege of addressing the jury (through his counsel) on the law, as well as on the fact, which was to determine his guilt, or innocence, and at the same time endeavoring to wrest from the jury their indisputable right to hear argument, and determine upon the question of law, as well as the question of fact, involved in the verdict which they were required to give:

In consequence of this irregular conduct of the said Samuel Chase, as dangerous to our liberties as it is novel to our laws and usages, the said John Fries was deprived of the right, secured to him by the eighth article amendatory of the Constitution, and was condemned to death without having been heard, by counsel, in his defence, to the disgrace of the character of the American bench, in manifest violation of law and justice, and in open contempt of the rights of juries, on which ultimately rest the liberty and safety of the American people.

When the PRESIDENT took the opinion of the members of the Court respectively, in the form following:

"Mr. —, how say you; is the respondent, Samuel Chase, guilty or not guilty of a high crime or misdemeanor, as charged in the first article of impeachment?"

Those who pronounced guilty, are:

Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Howland, Logan, Maclay, Moore, Stone, Sumter, Worthington, and Wright—16.

Those who pronounced not guilty, are:

Messrs. Adams, Bayard, Bradley, Dayton, Gaillard, Giles, Hillhouse, Jackson, Mitchell, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Ohio, Smith of Vermont, Tracy, White—18.

The second article was read by the Secretary, as follows:

ART. 2. That, prompted by a similar spirit of persecution and injustice, at a circuit court of the United States, held at Richmond, in the month of May, one thousand eight hundred, for the district of Virginia, whereat the said Samuel Chase presided, and before which a certain James Thompson Callender was arraigned for a libel on John Adams, then President of the United States, the said Samuel Chase, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the said Callender, did overrule the objection of John Basset, one of the jury, who wished to be excused from serving on the said trial because he had made up his mind as to the publication from which the words charged to be libellous in the indictment were extracted; and the said Basset was accordingly sworn and did serve on the said jury, by whose verdict the prisoner was subsequently convicted.

Those who pronounced guilty on this article, are:

Messrs. Anderson, Breckenridge, Cocke, Condit, Ellery, Giles, Howland, Maclay, Moore, and Sumter—10.

Those who pronounced not guilty, are:

Messrs. Adams, Baldwin, Bayard, Bradley, Brown, Dayton, Franklin, Gaillard, Hillhouse, Jackson, Logan, Mitchell, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Ohio, Smith of Vermont, Stone, Tracy, White, Worthington, and Wright—24.

The third article was read by the Secretary, as follows:

ART. 3. That, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the prisoner, the evidence of John Taylor, a material witness on behalf of the aforesaid Callender, was not permitted by the said Samuel Chase to be given in, on pretence that the said witness could not prove the truth of the whole of one of the charges contained in the indictment, although the said charge embraced more than one fact.

Those who pronounced guilty on this article, are:

Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Giles, Howland, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Moore, Smith of Maryland, Sumter, Worthington, and Wright—18.

Those who pronounced not guilty, are:

Messrs. Adams, Bayard, Bradley, Dayton, Gaillard, Hillhouse, Mitchell, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Smith of New York, Smith of Ohio, Smith of Vermont, Stone, Tracy, and White—16.

The fourth article was read by the Secretary, as follows:

ART. 4. That the conduct of the said Samuel Chase was marked, during the whole course of the said trial, by manifest injustice, partiality, and intemperance; viz:

1. In compelling the prisoner's counsel to reduce to writing, and submit to the inspection of the court, for their admission or rejection, all questions which the said counsel meant to propound to the above named John Taylor, the witness:

2. In refusing to postpone the trial, although an affidavit was regularly filed, stating the absence of material witnesses on behalf of the accused; and although it was manifest, that, with the utmost diligence, the attendance of such witnesses could not have been procured at that term:

Trial of Judge Chase.

3. In the use of unusual, rude, and contemptuous expressions towards the prisoner's counsel; and in falsely insinuating that they wished to excite the public fears and indignation, and to produce that insubordination to law to which the conduct of the judge did, at the same time, manifestly tend:

4. In repeated and vexatious interruptions of the said counsel, on the part of the said judge, which at length induced them to abandon their cause and their client, who was thereupon convicted and condemned to fine and imprisonment:

5. In an indecent solicitude manifested by the said Samuel Chase for the conviction of the accused, unbecoming even a public prosecutor, but highly disgraceful to the character of a judge, as it was subversive of justice.

Those who pronounced guilty on this article, are:

Messrs. Anderson, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Giles, Howland, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Moore, Smith of Maryland, Stone, Sumter, Worthington, and Wright—18.

Those who pronounced not guilty, are:

Messrs. Adams, Baldwin, Bayard, Bradley, Dayton, Gaillard, Hillhouse, Mitchill, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Smith of New York, Smith of Ohio, Smith of Vermont, Tracy, and White—16.

The fifth article was read by the Secretary, as follows:

ART. 5. And whereas it is provided by the act of Congress, passed on the 24th day of September, 1789, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," that for any crime or offence against the United States, the offender may be arrested, imprisoned, or bailed, agreeably to the usual mode of process in the State where such offender may be found: and whereas it is provided by the laws of Virginia, that upon presentment by any grand jury of an offence not capital, the court shall order the clerk to issue a summons against the person or persons offending, to appear and answer such presentment at the next court; yet the said Samuel Chase did, at the court aforesaid, award a capias against the body of the said James Thompson Callender, indicted for an offence not capital, whereupon the said Callender was arrested and committed to close custody, contrary to law in that case made and provided.

All the members pronounced not guilty on this article, viz:

Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Baldwin, Bayard, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Dayton, Ellery, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Hillhouse, Howland, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Mitchill, Moore, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Ohio, Smith of Vermont, Stone, Sumter, Tracy, White, Worthington, and Wright—34.

The sixth article was read by the Secretary, as follows:

ART. 6. And whereas it is provided by the 34th section of the aforesaid act, entitled "An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," that the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States, shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as the rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States; in cases where they apply; and whereas by the laws of Virginia it is provided, that in cases not capital, the offender shall not be held to answer any presentment of a grand jury until the court next succeeding that during which such presentment shall have been made, yet the said Samuel Chase, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the said James Thompson Callender, did, at the court aforesaid, rule and adjudge the said Callender to trial during the term at which he, the said Callender, was presented and indicted, contrary to law in that case made and provided.

Those who pronounced guilty on this article, are:

Messrs. Breckenridge, Cocke, Howland, and Maclay—4.

Those who pronounced not guilty, are:

Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Baldwin, Bayard, Bradley, Brown, Condit, Dayton, Ellery, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Hillhouse, Jackson, Logan, Mitchill, Moore, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Ohio, Smith of Vermont, Stone, Sumter, Tracy, White, Worthington, and Wright—30.

The seventh article was read by the Secretary, as follows:

ART. 7. That at a circuit court of the United States, for the district of Delaware, held at Newcastle; in the month of June, one thousand eight hundred, whereat the said Samuel Chase presided—the said Samuel Chase, disregarding the duties of his office, did descend from the dignity of a judge and stoop to the level of an informer, by refusing to discharge the grand jury, although entreated by several of the said jury so to do; and after the said grand jury had regularly declared, through their foreman, that they had found no bills of indictment, nor had any presentments to make, by observing to the said grand jury, that he, the said Samuel Chase, understood "that a highly seditious temper had manifested itself in the State of Delaware, among a certain class of people, particularly in Newcastle county, and more especially in the town of Wilmington, where lived a most seditious printer, unrestrained by any principle of virtue, and regardless of social order—that the name of this printer was"—but checking himself, as if sensible of the indecorum which he was committing, added, "that it might be assuming too much to mention the name of this person, but it becomes your duty, gentlemen, to inquire diligently into this matter;" and that with intention to procure the prosecution of the printer in question, the said Samuel Chase did, moreover, authoritatively enjoin on the District Attorney of the United States the necessity of procuring a file of the papers to which he alluded, (and which were understood to be those published under the title of "Mirror of the Times and General Advertiser,") and by a strict examination of them to find some passage which might furnish the ground-work of a prosecution against the printer of the said paper; thereby degrading his high judicial functions, and tending to impair the public confidence in, and respect for, the tribunals of justice, so essential to the general welfare.

Those who pronounced guilty on this article, are:

Messrs. Breckenridge, Cocke, Franklin, Howland, Jackson, Maclay, Smith of Maryland, Stone, Sumter, and Wright—10.

Those who pronounced not guilty, are:

Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Baldwin, Bayard, Bradley, Brown, Condit, Dayton, Ellery, Gaillard, Giles, Hillhouse, Logan, Mitchill, Moore, Olcott, Pickering,

Trial of Judge Chase.

Plumer, Smith of New York, Smith of Ohio, Smith of Vermont, Tracy, White, and Worthington—24.

The eighth article was read by the Secretary, as follows:

ART. 8. And whereas mutual respect and confidence between the Government of the United States and those of the individual States, and between the people and those Governments, respectively, are highly conducive to that public harmony, without which there can be no public happiness, yet the said Samuel Chase, disregarding the duties and dignity of his judicial character, did, at a circuit court, for the district of Maryland, held at Baltimore, in the month of May, one thousand eight hundred and three, pervert his official right and duty to address the grand jury then and there assembled, on the matters coming within the province of the said jury, for the purpose of delivering to the said grand jury an intemperate and inflammatory political harangue, with intent to excite the fears and resentment of the said grand jury, and of the good people of Maryland, against their State government and constitution—a conduct highly censurable in any, but peculiarly indecent and unbecoming in a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States; and, moreover, that the said Samuel Chase, then and there, under pretence of exercising his judicial right to address the said grand jury, as aforesaid, did, in a manner highly unwarrantable, endeavor to excite the odium of the said grand jury, and of the good people of Maryland, against the Government of the United States, by delivering opinions, which, even if the judicial authority were competent to their expression, on a suitable occasion and in a proper manner, were at that time, and as delivered by him, highly indecent, extra judicial, and tending to prostrate the high judicial character with which he was invested, to the low purpose of an electioneering partisan.

Those who pronounced guilty on this article, are:

Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Breckenridge, Brown, Cocke, Condit, Ellery, Franklin, Giles, Howland, Jackson, Logan, Maclay, Moore, Smith of Maryland, Stone, Sumter, Worthington, and Wright—19.

Those who pronounced not guilty, are:

Messrs. Adams, Bayard, Bradley, Dayton, Gaillard, Hillhouse, Mitchill, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, Smith of New York, Smith of Ohio, Smith of Vermont, Tracy, and White—15.

The PRESIDENT rose and said, on the first article, sixteen gentlemen have pronounced guilty, and eighteen not guilty; on the second article, ten have said guilty, and twenty-four not guilty; on the third article, eighteen have said guilty, and sixteen not guilty; on the fourth article, eighteen have said guilty, and sixteen not guilty; on the fifth article, there is an unanimous vote of not guilty; on the sixth article, four have said guilty, and thirty not guilty; on the seventh article, ten have said guilty, and twenty-four not guilty; and on the eighth article, nineteen have said guilty, and fifteen not guilty.

Hence, it appears that there is not a Constitutional majority of votes finding Samuel Chase, Esq., guilty, on any one article. It, therefore, becomes my duty to declare that Samuel Chase, Esq., stands acquitted of all the articles exhibited by the House of Representatives against him.

Whereupon, the Court adjourned without day.

APPENDIX

TO

THE TRIAL OF JUDGE CHASE.

Charge of Judge Chase, being exhibit number three, referred to in his answer.

Gentlemen of the Jury: John Fries, the prisoner at the bar, stands indicted for the crime of treason, of levying war against the United States, contrary to the Constitution.

By the Constitution of the United States, article three, section three, it is declared: "That treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."

By the same section, it is further declared: "That no person shall be convicted of treason, unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court;" and that "The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason."

Too much praise cannot be given to this Constitutional definition of treason, and the requiring such full proof for conviction; and declaring that no attainer of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attainted.

This Constitutional definition of treason is a definition of law. Every proposition in any statute (whether more or less distinct, whether easy or difficult to comprehend) is always a question of law. What is the true meaning or true import of any statute, and whether the case stated comes within it, is a question of law and not of fact. The question in an indictment for levying war against (or adhering to the enemies of) the United States, is "whether the facts stated do or do not amount to the levying of war" within the contemplation and construction of the Constitution.

It is the duty of the court in this case, and in all criminal cases, to state to the jury their opinion of the law arising on the facts; but the jury are to decide on the present and in all criminal cases, both the law and the facts, on their consideration of the whole case.

It is the opinion of the court that any insurrection or rising of any body of people, within the United States, to attain or effect, by force or violence, any object of a great public nature or of public and general (or national) concern, is a levying war against the United States, within the contemplation and construction of the Constitution.

On this general position the court are of opinion, that any such insurrection or rising to resist, or to prevent by force or violence, the execution of any statute of the United States, for levying or collecting taxes, duties, imposts, or excises; or for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, or for any other object of a general nature or national concern, under any pretence, as that the statute was unjust, burdensome, oppressive, or unconstitutional, is a levying war against the United States, within the contemplation and construction of the Constitution.

The reason for this opinion is, that an insurrection to resist or prevent by force the execution of any statute of the United States, has a direct tendency to dissolve all the bonds of society; to destroy all order and all laws; and also all security for the lives, liberties, and property of the citizens of the United States.

The court are of opinion that military weapons (as guns and swords mentioned in the indictment) are not necessary to make such insurrection or rising amount to levying war; because numbers supply the want of military weapons; and other instruments may effect the intended mischief. The legal guilt of levying war may be incurred without the use of military weapons or military array.

The court are of opinion that the assembling bodies of men, armed and arrayed in a warlike manner for purposes only of a private nature, is not treason; although the judges or other peace officers should be insulted or resisted, or even great outrages committed to the persons or property of our citizens.

The true criterion to determine whether acts committed are treason, or a less offence (as a riot) is the quo animo or the intention with which the people did assemble. When the intention is universal or general, to effect some object of a general public nature, it will be treason, and cannot be considered, construed, or reduced to a riot. The commission of any number of felonies, riots, or other misdemeanors, cannot alter their nature so as to make them amount to treason; and, on the other hand, if the intention and acts combined amount to treason, they cannot be sunk down to a felony or riot. The intention with which any acts (as felonies, the destruction of property, or the like) are done, will show to what class of crimes the case belongs.

The court are of opinion that if a body of people conspire and meditate an insurrection to resist or oppose the execution of any statute of the United States by force, that they are only guilty of a high misdemeanor, but if they proceed to carry such intention into execution by force, that they are guilty of the treason of levying war; and the quantum of the force employed neither lessens nor increases the crime, whether by one hundred or one thousand persons, is wholly immaterial.

The court are of opinion that a combination or conspiracy to levy war against the United States is not treason, unless combined with an attempt to carry such combination or conspiracy into execution; some actual force or violence must be used in pursuance of such design to levy war; but that it is altogether immaterial whether the force used is sufficient to effectuate the object; any force connected with the intention will constitute the crime of levying war.

This opinion of the court is founded on the same principles, and is, in substance, the same as the opinion of the circuit court for this district in the trials in April, 1795, of Vigol and Mitchell, who were both found guilty by the jury, and afterward pardoned by the late President.

At the circuit court for the district (April term, 1799,) on the trial of the prisoner at the bar, Judge Iredell delivered the same opinion; and Fries was convicted by the jury.

To support the present indictment against the prisoner at the bar, two facts must be proved to your satisfaction: First. That, some time before the finding of the indictment there was an insurrection (or rising) of a body of people in the county of Northampton, in this State, with intent to oppose and prevent, by means of intimidation and violence, the execution of a law of the United States, entitled "An act to provide for the valuation of lands and dwelling-houses, and the enumeration of slaves within the United States;" or of another law of the United States, entitled "An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States," and that some acts of violence were committed by some of the people so assembled, with intent to oppose and prevent, by means of intimidation and violence, the execution of both or of one of the said laws of Congress.

In the consideration of this fact, you are to consider and determine with what intent the people assembled at Bethlehem, whether to effect by force a public or a private measure.

The intent with which the people assembled at Bethlehem, in Northampton, is a necessary ingredient to the fact of assembling, and to be proved, like any other fact, by the declaration of those who assembled, or by acts done by them, when the question is, "What is the man's intent?" It may be proved by a number of connected circumstances, or by a single fact.

If, from a careful examination of the evidence, you shall be convinced that the real object and intent of the people assembled at Bethlehem was of a public nature, (which it certainly was if they assembled with intent to prevent the execution of both the above-mentioned laws of Congress, or either of them,) it must then be proved to your satisfaction that the prisoner at the bar incited, encouraged, promoted, or assisted in the insurrection or rising of the people at Bethlehem, and the terror they carried with them, with intent to oppose and prevent, by means of intimidation and violence, the execution of both the above-mentioned laws of Congress, or either of them; and that some force was used by some of the people assembled at Bethlehem.

In the consideration of this fact, the court think proper to assist your inquiry by giving you their opinion.

In treason all the participes crimines are principals; there are no accessories to this crime. Every act which in the case of felony would render a man an accessory, will in the case of treason make him a principal. To render any person an accomplice and principal in felony, he must be aiding and abetting at the fact, or ready to afford assistance, if necessary. If a person be present at a felony aiding or assisting, he is a principal. It is always material to consider, whether the persons charged are of the same party, upon the same pursuit, and under the expectation of mutual defence and support. All persons present, aiding, assisting, or abetting any treasonable act, are principals. All persons who are present, and countenancing, and are ready to afford assistance, if necessary, to those who actually commit any treasonable act, are also principals. If a number of persons assemble and set upon a common design, as to resist and prevent by force the execution of any law, and some of them commit acts of violence and force, with intent to oppose the execution of any law, and others are present to aid and assist, if necessary, they are all principals. If any man joins and acts with an assembly of people, his intent is always to be considered and adjudged to be the same as theirs; and the law in the case judgeth of the intent by the fact. If a number of persons combine or conspire to effect a certain purpose, as to oppose by force the execution of a law, any act of violence done by any one of them, in pursuance of such combination, and with intent to effect such object, is, in consideration of law, the act of all who are present when such act of violence is committed. If persons collect together to act for one and the same common end, any act done by any one of them, with intent to effectuate such common end, is a fact that may be given in evidence against all of them; the act of each is evidence against all concerned.

I shall not detain you at this late hour to recapitulate the facts; you have taken notes, and they have been stated with accuracy and great candor by Mr. Attorney.

I will only remark, that all the evidence relative to transactions before the assembling of the armed force at Bethlehem, are only to satisfy you of the intent with which the body of the people assembled there. If either of three overt acts (or open deeds) stated in the indictment, are proved to your satisfaction, the court are of opinion that is sufficient to maintain the indictment, for the court are of opinion that every overt act is treasonable.

As to accomplices, they are legal witnesses, and entitled to credit, unless destroyed by testimony in court.

If, upon consideration of the whole matter, (law as well as fact), you are not fully satisfied without any doubt that the prisoner is guilty of the treason charged in the indictment, you will find him not guilty; but if, upon the consideration of the whole matter, (law as well as fact), you are convinced that the prisoner is guilty of the treason charged in the indictment, you will find him guilty.

Exhibit number eight, referred to in Judge Chase's answer.

Copy of the conclusion of a charge delivered and read from the original manuscript, at a circuit court of the United States, holden in the city of Baltimore, on Monday the second day of May, 1803, by Samuel Chase, one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Before you retire, gentlemen, to your chamber to consider such matters as may be brought before you, I will take the liberty to make a few observations, which I hope you will receive as flowing only from my regard to the welfare and prosperity of our common country.

It is essentially necessary at all times, but more particularly at the present, that the public mind should be truly informed; and that our citizens should entertain correct principles of government, and fixed ideas of their social rights. It is a very easy task to deceive or mislead the great body of the people by propagating plausible, but false doctrines, for the bulk of mankind are governed by their passions and not by reason.

Falsehood can be more readily disseminated than truth, and the latter is heard with reluctance if repugnant to popular prejudice. From the year 1776, I have been a decided and avowed advocate for a representative or republican form of government, as since established by our State and national Constitutions. It is my sincere wish that freemen should be governed by their representatives, fairly and freely elected by that class of citizens described in our bill of rights, "who have property in, a common interest with, and an attachment to, the community."

The purposes of civil society are best answered by those governments where the public safety, happiness, and prosperity, are best formed, whatever may be the constitution and form of government; but the history of mankind (in ancient and modern times) informs us "that a monarchy may be free, and that a republic may be a tyranny." The true test of liberty is in the practical enjoyment of protection to the person and the property of the citizen, from all injury. Where the same laws govern the whole society without any distinction, and there is no power to dispense with the execution of the laws; where justice is impartially and speedily administered, and the poorest man in the community may obtain redress against the most wealthy and powerful, and riches afford no protection to violence; and where the person and property of every man are secure from insult and injury; in that country the people are free. This is our present situation. Where law is uncertain, partial, or arbitrary; where justice is not impartially administered to all; where property is insecure, and the person is liable to insult and violence without redress by law, the people are not free, whatever may be their form of government. To this situation I greatly fear we are fast approaching!

You know, gentlemen, that our State and national institutions were framed to secure to every member of the society equal liberty and equal rights; but the late alteration of the Federal Judiciary by the abolition of the office of the sixteen circuit judges, and the recent change in our State constitution by the establishing of universal suffrage, and the further alteration that is contemplated in our State judiciary (if adopted) will, in my judgment, take away all security for property and personal liberty. The independence of the national Judiciary is already shaken to its foundation, and the virtue of the people alone can restore it. The independence of the judges of this

Trial of Judge Chase.

State will be entirely destroyed, if the bill for the abolition of the two supreme courts should be ratified by the next General Assembly. The change of the State constitution, by allowing universal suffrage, will, in my opinion, certainly and rapidly destroy all protection to property, and all security to personal liberty; and our republican constitution will sink into a mobocracy, the worst of all possible governments.

I can only lament that the main pillar of our State constitution has already been thrown down by the establishment of universal suffrage. By this shock alone the whole building totters to its base, and will crumble into ruins before many years elapse, unless it be restored to its original state. If the independency of your State judges which your bill of rights wisely declares "to be essential to the impartial administration of justice, and the great security to the rights and liberties of the people," shall be taken away by the ratification of the bill passed for that purpose, it will precipitate the destruction of your whole State constitution, and there will be nothing left in it worthy the care or support of freemen.

I cannot but remember the great and patriotic characters by whom your State constitution was framed. I cannot but recollect that attempts were then made in favor of universal suffrage, and to render the judges dependent upon the Legislature. You may believe that the gentlemen who framed your constitution, possessed the full confidence of the people of Maryland, and that they were esteemed for their talents and patriotism, and for their public and private virtues. You must have heard that many of them held the highest civil and military stations, and that they, at every risk and danger, assisted to obtain and establish your independence. Their names are enrolled on the Journals of the first Congress, and may be seen in the proceedings of the Convention that framed our form of Government. With great concern I observe that the sons of some of these characters have united to pull down the beautiful fabric of wisdom and republicanism that their fathers erected!

The declarations respecting the natural rights of man, which originated from the claim of the British Parliament to make laws to bind America in all cases whatsoever; the publications since that period, of visionary and theoretical writers, asserting that men in a state of society are entitled to exercise rights which they possessed in a state of nature; and the modern doctrines by our late reformers, that all men in a state of society are entitled to enjoy equal liberty and equal rights, have brought this mighty mischief upon us; and I fear that it will rapidly progress, until peace and order, freedom and property, shall be destroyed. Our people are taught as a political creed, that men living under an established Government, are, nevertheless, entitled to exercise certain rights which they possessed in a state of nature; and, also, that every member of this Government is entitled to enjoy an equality of liberty and rights.

I have long since subscribed to the opinion, that there could be no rights of man in a state of nature previous to the institution of society; and that liberty, properly speaking, could not exist in a state of nature. I do not believe that any number of men ever existed together in a state of nature without some head, leader, or chief, whose advice they followed, and whose precepts they obeyed. I really consider a state of nature as a creature of the imagination only, although great names give a sanction to a contrary opinion. The great object for which men establish any form of government, is to obtain security to their persons and property from violence; destroy the security to either, and you tear up society by the roots. It appears to me that the institution of government is really no sacrifice made, as some writers contend, to natural liberty, for I think that previous to the formation of some species of government, a state of liberty could not exist. It seems to me that personal liberty and rights can only be acquired by becoming a member of a community, which gives the protection of the whole to every individual. Without this protection it would, in my opinion, be impracticable to enjoy personal liberty or rights. From hence I conclude that liberty and rights (and also property) must spring out of civil society, and must be forever subject to the modification of particular governments. I hold the position clear and safe, that all the rights of man can be derived only from the conventions of society, and may with propriety be called social rights. I cheerfully subscribe to the doctrine of equal liberty and equal rights, if properly explained. I understand by equality of liberty and rights only this, that every citizen, without respect to property or station, should enjoy an equal share of civil liberty, an equal protection from the laws, and an equal security for his person and property. Any other interpretation of these terms is, in my judgment, destructive of all government and all laws. If I am substantially correct in these sentiments, it is unnecessary to make any application of them, and I will only ask two questions. Will justice be impartially administered by judges dependent on the Legislature for their continuance in office, and also for their support? Will liberty or property be protected or secured, by laws made by representatives chosen by electors, who have no property in, a common interest with, or attachment to the community?

H. OF R.

Proceedings.

NOVEMBER, 1804.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House cause the members to be furnished, during the present session, with three newspapers to each member, such as the members, respectively, shall choose, to be delivered at their lodgings; and that if any member shall choose to take any newspaper other than a daily paper, he shall be furnished with as many of such newspapers as shall not exceed the price of a daily paper.

Resolved, That, unless otherwise ordered, the daily hour to which the House shall stand adjourned, during the present session, be eleven o'clock in the forenoon.

TUESDAY, November 6.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, MANASSEH CUTLER; from Connecticut, SAMUEL W. DANA and ROGER GRISWOLD; from New Jersey, JAMES MOTT; from Pennsylvania, JOHN A. HANNA, JOHN B. C. LUCAS, and ISAAC VAN HORNE; from Maryland, JOHN CAMPBELL; from Virginia, JOHN CLOPTON; and from South Carolina, THOMAS LOWNDES; appeared and took their seats in the House.

Another new member, to wit: ROGER NELSON, from Maryland, returned to serve in this House as a member for the said State, in the room of Daniel Heister, deceased, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH moved for the appointment of a committee on the part of the House to join a committee of the Senate to wait on the President and inform him that a quorum of both Houses are formed, and ready to receive his communications.

Mr. DANA inquired if a quorum of the Senate was formed? That circumstance, he thought, ought to be ascertained before the House adopted the gentleman's resolution.

Mr. RANDOLPH did not know whether or no the Senate had formed a quorum, but he saw no objection on that account to proceeding with their own business. He however had understood that the Senate would form a quorum this day.

The resolution was carried, and Messrs. J. RANDOLPH and R. GRISWOLD appointed the committee.

Mr. J. C. SMITH requested the House to excuse him from serving on the Committee of Claims; he had been on that committee for four years past, and he knew that the members of that committee, particularly, ought to remain at the seat of Government during the whole session; he unfortunately would be obliged to ask leave of absence in January, at farthest. He was hereupon excused, and Mr. DANA appointed in his place.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what amendments are necessary to be made in the acts establishing a post office and post roads within the United States, and that the said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. NEWTON, Mr. THOMAS, Mr. HANNA, Mr. NAHUM MITCHELL, Mr. LOWNDES,

Mr. GEORGE WASHINGTON, CAMPBELL, and Mr. SOUTHARD, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH requested information from the Chair as to the situation in which the articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, were left at the last session. The House would recollect that they were then merely reported and ordered to be printed. If that business was to be prosecuted, he conceived it of importance that the party should have all the time to prepare for his defence that political existence would allow him. Was it the opinion of the Speaker that this subject was before the Committee of Revised and Unfinished Business, or should it be referred to a special committee to prepare articles de novo?

The SPEAKER judged that it was before the Committee of Revised and Unfinished Business as a matter of course.

Mr. VARNUM moved for the appointment of Chaplains to Congress for the present session, one by each House, to interchange weekly.

Mr. SMITH thought that a Chaplain, when once appointed by the House, should remain as an officer of the House during its Constitutional existence, in like manner as the Speaker, Clerk, and other officers.

Mr. VARNUM turned the gentleman to the Journal, in which it would be found that Chaplains were expressly appointed for the session.

The SPEAKER declared the practice had always been to appoint them every session.

Mr. GRISWOLD observed, that were the Chaplain an officer of that House only, the gentleman's (Mr. S.) idea would be correct; but he would recollect that the Senate had a concurrent vote on this subject.

The resolution was hereupon adopted.

Ordered, That the report of the committee appointed on the thirteenth of March last, to prepare and report articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, be referred to a select committee, and that Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, Mr. JOSEPH CLAY, Mr. EARLY, Mr. BOYLE, and Mr. Rhea of Tennessee, be appointed of the said committee.

WEDNESDAY, November 7.

Several other members, to wit: from Maryland, JOSEPH H. NICHOLSON; from Virginia, WALTER JONES; from South Carolina, THOMAS MOORE; and from Georgia, JOSEPH BRYAN, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

Mr. LEIB observed the narrow limits to which the members were confined by the reduced size of the Chamber they now occupied, and the difficulty the members were exposed to in passing and repassing in the lobby by the admission of strangers. He was forced, by these considerations, to move the House to rescind one of their rules, which permitted the members to introduce strangers. But as another required that motions for altering the standing rules of the House should only be made by giving one day's previous notice, he contented himself with laying his motion on the table.

On motion of Mr. LEIB, a Committee of Accounts was appointed, whose duty it is to superintend and control the expenditure of the contingent fund of the House, and to audit and settle all accounts charged upon the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and ready to proceed to business. The Senate have appointed a committee on their part, jointly with the committee appointed on the part of this House, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make to them.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the resolution of this House for the appointment of Chaplains to Congress for the present session, and have appointed the Rev. Mr. McCORMICK, on their part.

The House then proceeded, by ballot, to the appointment of a Chaplain to Congress, on the part of this House; and, upon examining the ballots, a majority of the votes of the whole House was found in favor of the Rev. WILLIAM BENTLEY.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, reported that the committee had performed that service, and that the President signified to them he would make a communication to this House, in writing, to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

THURSDAY, November 8.

Several other members, to wit: from New Hampshire, SAMUEL HUNT; from Massachusetts, SAMUEL TAGGART; from Connecticut, SIMEON BALDWIN and CALVIN GODDARD; and from North Carolina, SAMUEL D. PURVIANCE; appeared, and took their seats in the House.

A memorial of the Board of Trustees of Jefferson College in the Mississippi Territory of the United States, signed by Cato West, their President pro tempore, and attested by Felix Hughes, their Secretary, was presented to the House and read, praying that the title to certain lots or parcels of land, situate in the city of Natchez; also, to an outlet adjoining the same, may be confirmed by Congress, for the benefit and accommodation of the said College, and thereby to promote the education of youth within the said Territory.

Ordered, That the said memorial, together with the petition of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Assistants, of the city of Natchez, and of William Dunbar, presented the ninth of November, one thousand eight hundred and three, and twenty-sixth of January, one thousand eight hundred and four, and two reports of select committees, made at the last session, thereon, be referred to Mr. LATTIMORE, Mr. THOMAS M. RANDOLPH, Mr. STEDMAN, Mr. ALSTON, and Mr. ELLIOT; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereon, to the House.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, by Mr. BURWELL, his Secretary, as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I am directed to hand you a communication, in writing, from the PRESIDENT to the two Houses of Congress.

The communication was read, and, together with the documents accompanying the same, referred to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union. [See Senate proceedings of this date, page 11, for the Message.]

The motion made yesterday by Mr. LEIB, was taken into consideration, and an amendment was proposed by adding, "blacks and people of color, other than freemen, shall be excluded from the gallery."

This gave rise to some conversation, after which the amendment, upon a division of the House, appeared to have but one member in its favor.

The question on the resolution to exclude all persons from the lobby except members of the Senate and Stenographers, was taken and lost, only 32 members voting for it.

Mr. J. CLAY moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to present, in the name of Congress, to Captain Stephen Decatur, a sword, of the value of — dollars, and to each of the officers and crew of the United States ketch Intrepid, — months' pay, as a testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of the gallantry, good conduct, and services, of Captain Decatur, the officers, and crew, of the said ketch, in attacking and destroying a Tripolitan frigate, of forty-four guns, late the United States frigate Philadelphia.

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. TENNEY, from the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, to whom it was referred to examine the Journal of the last session, and report therefrom such matters of business as were then depending and undetermined, made a report, in part; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FRIDAY, November 9.

Two other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, WILLIAM EUSTIS; and from Pennsylvania, ROBERT BROWN, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

FRIGATE PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. J. CLAY's motion relative to Captain Decatur and the officers and crew of the ketch Intrepid, was taken up in Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the resolution was altered, by striking out after the word "sword," the words "the value of — dollars," and filling up the other blank with the word "two," thereby giving the officers and crew two months' pay.

Mr. C., with a view of showing the propriety of the measure, read extracts of letters written by Commodore Preble and Lieut. Decatur, which had been obtained from the Secretary of the Navy; they contained an account of the circumstances attending this honorable exploit, which have heretofore been printed in the public newspapers.

The Committee rose and reported the resolution as amended.

Mr. GRISWOLD presumed the object of this step was to pay a tribute of respect to those brave men who had so gallantly achieved this glorious and dangerous enterprise. He wished to do this in a manner the most honorable and notorious, and perhaps the best course would be to obtain, from the Head of the Navy Department, a list of the names of the officers and the number of the crew, together with a detail of the circumstances attending the event. With this view, he moved to postpone the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee of the Whole, till tomorrow, in order to introduce a resolution to this effect:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to this House the names of the officers and the number of the men employed in the destruction of the frigate Philadelphia in the harbor of Tripoli, together with a statement of the circumstances attending that event.

The postponement was agreed to without opposition, and the resolution of Mr. GRISWOLD was adopted, with a small variation, suggested by Mr. J. RANDOLPH, and acquiesced in by the mover, to wit: "That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House," &c.

Mr. J. CLAY and Mr. T. M. RANDOLPH were appointed a committee to wait on the President and communicate the request of the House.

MONDAY, November 12.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, PELEG WADSWORTH; from New Jersey, WILLIAM HELMS; from Delaware, CESAR A. RODNEY; from Virginia, MATTHEW CLAY; from North Carolina, MARMADUKE WILLIAMS and THOMAS WYNN; and from South Carolina, LEVI CASEY and RICHARD WINN; appeared, and took their seats in the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH submitted seven resolutions, which were agreed to, and afterwards adopted by the House, as follows:

1. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the restraining of our merchant vessels arming themselves without authority, and attempting to force a commerce into certain ports and countries, in defiance of the laws of those countries, be referred to a select committee.

2. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to an amelioration of the form of government of the Territory of Louisiana, be referred to a select committee.

3. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as recommends an enlargement of the capital employed in commerce with the Indian tribes, be referred to a select committee.

4. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the defence and security of our ports and harbors, and supporting within our waters the authority of our laws, be referred to a select committee.

5. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the improvement of the militia system of the United States, be referred to a select committee.

6. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the inconvenience arising from the distance to which, under existing laws, prizes captured from the corsairs of Barbary must be brought for adjudication, be referred to a select committee.

7. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the lead mines of Louisiana, be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Ordered, That Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. DAWSON, Mr. GODDARD, Mr. WYNN, Mr. ROOT, Mr. BETTON, and Mr. KNIGHT, be appointed a committee pursuant to the first resolution.

Ordered, That Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, Mr. ROGER GRISWOLD, Mr. THOMAS MOORE, Mr. SMILIE, Mr. GILLESPIE, Mr. DWIGHT, and Mr. SAMMONS, be appointed a committee pursuant to the second resolution.

Ordered, That Mr. JOSEPH CLAY, Mr. LIVINGSTON, and Mr. SANDFORD, be appointed a committee pursuant to the third resolution.

Ordered, That Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. BROWN, Mr. GRIFFIN, Mr. RIKER, Mr. HUNT, Mr. SEAVER, and Mr. OLIN, be appointed a committee pursuant to the fourth resolution.

Ordered, That Mr. VARNUM, Mr. VAN CORTLANDT, Mr. STEPHENSON, Mr. HELMS, and Mr. HOLLAND, be appointed a committee pursuant to the fifth resolution.

Ordered, That Mr. RODNEY, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. LUCAS, Mr. NELSON, Mr. LARNED, and Mr. LOWNDES, be appointed a committee pursuant to the sixth resolution.

Mr. GRISWOLD stated that some inconvenience had been felt by some of the merchants of the Atlantic ports in making shipments to New Orleans, as they were not authorized to obtain drawbacks on a reshipment from that port to a foreign country; heretofore New Orleans had been a depot from which many foreign articles were shipped to the French, Spanish, and even British colonies and islands, a commerce that had been very productive. He wished, if there was no solid objection to it, that the usual course of trade might be continued. He, therefore, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing, under proper regulations, a drawback of duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the port of New Orleans from any port of the United States, and from thence exported to any foreign port or place, and that the Committee report by bill or otherwise.

The resolution was carried nem. con.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Mr. Thomas Claxton, Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives of the United States, written in his official capacity, stating that, at the request of one of the inhabitants of the city, the Chaplain to the Senate, after he had performed Divine service in the Chamber of the House of Representatives in the forenoon, gave notice that, in the afternoon, a stranger would preach in the same room, which is a thing altogether unusual. This notice was given without consulting the SPEAKER, or being mentioned to any other officer of the House. Believing it to be a precedent which might hereafter lead to many inconveniences, he opposed the measure, &c. In taking this step he unfortunately gave umbrage to some of the gentlemen belonging to the House. This circumstance induced him to hope that the SPEAKER would establish some regulation on this point, or bring the matter before the House for its decision.

Mr. SPEAKER observed, that he had never exercised any authority on this subject. Whenever he had been applied to for leave to preach in that room, he had uniformly answered that he had no objection.

On motion, the letter was referred to a committee of three.

BRITISH TREATY.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH informed the House that the Committee of Ways and Means had received a communication from the Treasury Department, stating that the appropriation of $50,000, for carrying into effect the seventh article of the British Treaty, had not been sufficient to discharge the second instalment upon all the awards made in pursuance thereof, and suggesting the propriety of making, as early as possible, a further appropriation for that object. The Secretary of State estimated the amount unpaid at $60,000, and that, in order to prevent any disappointment, it would be eligible to make the appropriation $70,000. Mr. R. hereupon moved that the Committee of Ways and Means have leave to report a bill on this subject. Leave being granted,

Mr. J. R. reported a bill accordingly, which was read a first and second time, and referred to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

TUESDAY, November 13.

Two other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, RICHARD CUTTS; and from South Carolina, WILLIAM BUTLER; appeared, and took their seats in the House.

No quorum being present, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, November 14.

Another member to wit: PHANUEL BISHOP, from Massachusetts, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

A memorial of Duncan McFarland, of the State of North Carolina, was presented to the House and read, stating his claim to a seat in this House, as the Representative from the seventh election district of the said State; and praying that the House will take into farther consideration and ultimately decide on the subject-matter of his memorial presented the eighth of February last.—Referred to the Committee of Elections.

A memorial of William Dunbar, of the Mississippi Territory of the United States, was presented to the House and read, praying, for the reasons therein specified, that Congress will be pleased to postpone the consideration of any petition of or claim respecting the title to a certain lot or parcel of land within the limits of the city of Natchez, which has been granted to the memorialists by the Spanish Government, in consideration of services heretofore rendered by him to the said Government.—Referred.

On motion of Mr. VARNUM, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to consider at large the subject relative to invalid pensioners, and all persons wounded or disabled in the service of the United States, during the late Revolutionary war with Great Britain; and report to the House what further measures are, in their opinion, necessary to be adopted, in order to render them such ample remuneration for their sufferings as justice may require.

A memorial and petition of sundry inhabitants of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, was presented to the House and read, submitting to the consideration of Congress certain propositions, by way of modification and amendment of an act passed at the last session, entitled "An act to amend the charter of Alexandria," which they pray may be adopted for the convenience and benefit of the memorialists and other inhabitants of the said town.—Referred to Mr. EPPES, Mr. J. CAMPBELL, and Mr. THOMPSON; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. LEIS mentioned to the House the condition in which the public buildings (the arsenal at Philadelphia) the property of the United States were; one of the sections was raised to the first floor, and some other parts were left unfinished; indeed all the uncovered parts of the buildings were more or less suffering dilapidation or going to decay; he thought it would be found prudent to finish them in order to preserve them. He therefore moved that a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law for the completion of the public buildings belonging to the United States, near Philadelphia.—Referred to a select committee of three members.

On motion, of Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL, it was

Resolved, That the committee appointed the twelfth instant on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to "the enlargement of the capital employed in commerce with the Indian tribes," be instructed to inquire what alterations and amendments are necessary in the "act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes;" and to report thereon by bill, or otherwise.

THURSDAY, November 15.

Two other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, SAMUEL THATCHER; and from Pennsylvania, ANDREW GREGG; appeared, and took their seats in the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making farther appropriation for carrying into effect the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America. The bill was reported with an amendment, which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

Agreeably to your resolution of the ninth instant, I now lay before you a statement of the circumstances attending the destruction of the frigate Philadelphia, with the names of the officers and the number of men employed on the occasion; to which I have to add, that Lieutenant Decatur was, thereupon, advanced to be a Captain in the Navy of the United States.

Nov. 15, 1804.

TH. JEFFERSON.

The said Message and the papers referred to therein, were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, description of claims against the United States are barred by the statutes of limitation, which, in reason and justice, ought to be provided for by law; and that the said committee have leave to report thereon by bill, or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. CLAIBORNE, Mr. HOUGH, Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. KNIGHT, Mr. J. C. SMITH, Mr. CHITTENDEN, Mr. McCORD, Mr. BOYD, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. RODNEY, Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. BEDINGER, Mr. MARMADUKE WILLIAMS, Mr. DICKSON, Mr. CASEY, Mr. MERIWETHER, and Mr. MORROW, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Ordered, That the copy of an act passed by the Legislature of the State of North Carolina, on the twenty-second of December, one thousand eight hundred and three, entitled "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to perfect titles to lands reserved to this State by the cession act," which was presented to this House on the fourteenth of February last, be referred to Mr. ALSTON, Mr. WINN, Mr. TAGGART, Mr. JOHN RHEA, of Tennessee, and Mr. BARD, with leave to report thereon by way of bill, or bills.

Mr. NEWTON stated a fact relative to a citizen of Georgia, who had been sued in that State; but the creditor, finding the citizen was coming to Washington, dismissed his suit there, and procured his arrest here. The debtor, as a stranger, for want of bail must have gone to prison, but through the humanity of the marshal, who accompanied him to several places in the Territory in search of a friend, the debtor was fortunate enough to procure the requisite security, and thereby avoided the hardships of imprisonment. To prevent in future this species of oppression to which strangers are liable, he moved that a select committee of five be appointed to inquire whether any, and if any, what alterations are necessary to be made in the laws of the District of Columbia relative to holding persons to bail, and that they be authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

A committee of five was appointed accordingly.

NEW YORK SLATE COMPANIES.

Mr. MITCHILL made a report from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures on the petition of the Slate Companies of New York and Dutchess counties, concluding that any additional duty on imported slate at this time will be inexpedient. The general principle upon which this report was bottomed, being of considerable importance, and likely to excite discussion, he moved to refer it to a Committee of the Whole, and that it be made the order for Tuesday next; agreed to, and in the mean time ordered to be printed. The report is as follows:

Two associations of individuals, in the State of New York, were formed, one in the year 1800, and the other in 1803, for the purpose of exploring and opening quarries of slate, within Dutchess county, in the said State. After expending considerable capital, they state that they have been successful in finding slate of an excellent quality. This they have brought to market in great quantity, and offer for sale at a reduced price of fifty per cent. They allege that they are capable of supplying the whole domestic demand for this useful article of building, and could easily furnish slate of various sizes and thickness, for exportation. But they complain of the rivalry and competition of the importers of slate from foreign countries; who, by means of superior numbers and capitals, can, without sensible inconvenience, submit to temporary losses, undersell the petitioners, and interrupt the regular course of their domestic industry. For the sake of preventing these discouraging embarrassments, they solicit an increase of impost on the importation of slate from foreign parts.

In the preamble to the act "making further provision for the payment of debts of the United States," passed August 10, 1790, it is declared that duties were laid on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures. By the first section of that act, slate was charged with a duty of ten per cent. ad valorem. Afterwards, by the act "for raising a further sum of money for the protection of the frontiers, and for other purposes therein mentioned," passed May 2, 1792, an additional two and a half per cent. was added; but this ceased at the end of two years, by its own limitation. Then again an additional five per cent. ad valorem was laid upon imported slate, by the first section of the "act for laying additional duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States," passed June 7, 1794.

A further impost of two and a half per cent. was laid by the first section of the "act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers," passed March 25, 1804, upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, chargeable with an ad valorem duty. Slate comes within this class of articles. The money collected goes to "the Mediterranean fund;" and this additional two and a half per cent. will not be discontinued until three months after a ratification of a Treaty of Peace with Tripoli.

Hence, it appears that the existing duties on slate, imported from foreign ports, amount to seventeen and a half per cent. if imported in ships or vessels of the United States; and computing the ten per cent. additional, amount to nineteen and a half per cent. upon all slate imported in vessels not of the United States. When to these are added freight, commission, insurance, and the other heavy charges on such a bulky article, it would seem that a sufficient protecting duty was already imposed to encourage this species of domestic manufacture. The committee are inclined to think it would be impolitic to increase the import to a prohibitory amount.

The committee cannot forbear to express a sentiment of pleasure on this discovery of an inexhaustible quantity of an incombustible material for covering buildings. The increasing scarcity of timber, and the prevailing custom of constructing fire-proof houses, added to the more excellent, it may be said unequalled quality and abundance of the slate of New York, may be expected in a short time to accomplish the wishes of the petitioners, and give the home made slate a complete ascendancy in the market. While, therefore, they rejoice at the detection of this new resource of their country, and of its proportionally increased independence, they forbear to recommend any augmentation of impost upon its introduction from abroad.

On the whole, it is the opinion of the committee that any additional duty upon imported slate would, at this time, be inexpedient.

FRIDAY, November 16.

On motion, of Mr. R. GRISWOLD, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether further provisions ought not to be made by law for the encouragement of the fisheries of the United States; and that the committee report by bill, or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. R. GRISWOLD, Mr. GREGG, Mr. VERPLANCE, Mr. CLARK, and Mr. TAGGART, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Ordered, That the report of a select committee made on the third of January last, on the subject of the whale and cod-fisheries of the United States, be referred to the committee last appointed.

On motion, of Mr. W. JACKSON, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill making provision for the application of the money heretofore appropriated to laying out and making certain public roads.

Ordered, That Mr. JACKSON, Mr. MORROW, Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL, Mr. BOYLE, and Mr. STEWART, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee of Elections, to whom it was referred to examine the certificates of election or other credentials of the members returned to serve in this House, made a report, in part, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BRYAN reported from the committee on the official letter of Mr. THOMAS CLAXTON, Door-keeper of the House of Representatives, respecting the admission of Chaplains to preach in the Chamber of Congress; that in the case stated by him, he had acted with propriety, and they recommended a resolution to the following effect: That no person shall be authorized to preach in this Chamber unless by consent of the Speaker, or being introduced by one of the Chaplains.

Ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill making a farther appropriation for carrying into effect the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, was read the third time, and passed.

MONDAY, November 19.

Another member, to wit: SETH HASTINGS, from Massachusetts, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Thomas M. Thompson, Secretary of the State of Pennsylvania, accompanying the copy of a letter from William Hoge, addressed to the Governor of Pennsylvania, containing his resignation of a seat in this House, as one of the members for the said State; also, a copy of the Governor's writ of election to supply the vacancy occasioned thereby, and a duplicate return of the election of John Hoge, to serve in this House as a Representative for the said State of Pennsylvania, in the room of the said William Hoge; which were read, and referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. S. L. MITCHILL called the attention of the House to a subject he considered of importance to the literary institutions of the United States. Understanding that an application was about to be made to Congress from the College of Princeton for an abatement of the bonded duties due on a recent importation of books and philosophical apparatus, imported for the use of that seminary, he undertook to foretell the fate of the application. The committee would probably report as had been usual—that the prayer of the petition cannot be granted. True, gentlemen felt it a painful task to report negatively, but such had ever been the case. Yet he would advocate a relaxation of that principle. He had himself, when applied to on such occasions, replied that the United States wanted revenue and of course must seek it from the imports as well of literary institutions as of private individuals; but this reason has now less weight than heretofore—laying out of the question all that relates to the importance of education, especially in a Republican Government like that of the United States, he would only remark that the President's Message showed that such was the flourishing state of our affairs generally, particularly of our revenue, that we might now dispense with the collection of duties on these importations. He hereupon moved that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of exempting from impost all such books and philosophical apparatus as shall be imported on account of colleges and universities, for the benefit of those learned institutions, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

The motion passed in the affirmative.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution reported, on the ninth instant, from the Committee of the Whole House to whom was referred a motion relative "to Captain Stephen Decatur, the officers, and crew, of the United States' ketch Intrepid;" and the said resolution being twice read, and amended at the Clerk's table, was agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be requested to present, in the name of Congress, to Captain Stephen Decatur, a sword; and to each of the officers and crew of the United States ketch Intrepid, two months's pay, as a testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of the gallantry, good conduct, and services of Captain Decatur, the officers, and crew, of the said ketch, in attacking, in the harbor of Tripoli, and destroying a Tripolitan frigate of forty-four guns.

Ordered, That the said resolution be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee of the sixteenth instant, to whom was referred a letter addressed to the Speaker, from the Doorkeeper of the House, which lay on the table; and the resolution submitted by the committee in the said report, being twice read and amended at the Clerk's table, was agreed to by the House, as follows:

"Resolved, That in future, no person shall be permitted to perform Divine service in the Chamber occupied by the House of Representatives, unless with the consent of the Speaker."

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with a report and estimates of appropriation necessary for the service of the year one thousand eight hundred and five; also, a statement of receipts and expenditures at the Treasury of the United States for one year preceding the first day of October, one thousand eight hundred and four; which were read and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

An engrossed resolution, in the form of a concurrent resolution of the two Houses, "expressive of the sense of Congress of the gallant conduct of Captain Stephen Decatur, the officers, and crew, of the United States' ketch Intrepid, in attacking, in the harbor of Tripoli, and destroying a Tripolitan frigate of forty-four guns, was read the third time, and on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—Yeas 104, nays 2, as follows:

TUESDAY, November 20.

Another member, to wit: GEORGE TIBBITS, from New York, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

On a motion made and seconded to add a new rule to the standing rules and orders of the House, in the words following, to wit:

"That each of the Committees of this House be empowered to appoint a chairman, by plurality of votes, in all cases where the first named member of the Committee shall be absent, or excused by the House;"

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to Mr. DAWSON, Mr. ROGER GRISWOLD, and Mr. HEISTER, to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. ALSTON, from the committee appointed on the fourteenth instant, presented a bill declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Mr. MATTHEW CLAY, from the committee appointed, presented a bill giving the power to the stockholders of the Marine Insurance Company of Alexandria, to insure against fire; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message respecting the lead mines in Louisiana, reported a resolution authorizing the President to appoint an agent, who shall be instructed to collect all the material information respecting the actual condition, occupancy, and title of the same, and the agent to make report before the next session of Congress. The resolution was read a second time, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LUCAS suggested the propriety of altering the resolution, so as to make it general to all kinds of ore, and even to embrace salt springs and licks. He knew there were other ores in that Territory, and had seen specimens of a very rich copper ore when he had gone into the country.

Mr. MITCHELL said, that the Executive had anticipated the gentleman's object, and he expected the House would be soon gratified with an account of the discoveries now making by Major Lewis, and other agents on the Missouri, Arkansas, Red river, &c., as they respect the mineral, vegetable, and animal kingdoms, on which account he preferred the resolution in its present state.

The resolution was carried without opposition, and adopted by the House after the rising of the committee, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

WEDNESDAY, November 21.

Another member, to wit: JOHN PATTERSON, from New York, appeared and took his seat in the House.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, moved a resolution for the establishment of an office for exhibiting and recording deeds and papers relating to grants of land in Louisiana, whether made by France, Spain, or Great Britain; to be entered in the original language, with an American translation of the same. Ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill giving power to the stockholders of the Marine Insurance Company of Alexandria to insure against fire; and, after some time spent therein the Committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, who were instructed by a resolution of this House, of the nineteenth instant, "to inquire into the expediency of exempting from impost all such books and philosophical apparatus as shall be imported on account of the colleges and universities existing within the United States, for the proper and exclusive use of the learned institutions;" made a report thereon, which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

LOUISIANA LEAD MINES.

The engrossed resolution authorizing the President to appoint an agent, who shall be instructed to collect all the material information respecting the actual condition, occupancy, and title of the lead mines in Louisiana, was taken up on its third reading.

Mr. LUCAS entertained a doubt as to the propriety of this measure; indeed, the gentleman from New York, (Mr. MITCHILL,) seemed to admit that it was superfluous, for he had said that the President, under proper authority, had already appointed agents to explore generally the Territory of Louisiana; that they have been sometime engaged in that service at the Missouri, Arkansas, Red river, and about Detroit, and indeed Major Lewis had been sometime in St. Louis, a post in the neighborhood of these very lead mines, and from his known enterprise and minute inquiries, there was good reason for believing that the subject which was the object of the proposed resolution, would be narrated in his general report of discoveries. But in addition to this expectation, the document accompanying the President's Message sheds considerable light. The information as to the condition of the lead mines, their number, names, and value, were explained, and as he had heard no gentleman suggest a doubt as to the accuracy of the narrative, he was inclined to give it full credit, from the general character of the gentleman who made the communication, and the particular knowledge he must necessarily have acquired by a long residence in the country. From this view of the subject he was compelled to acknowledge that he had altered his idea of the resolution, and could not now vote in its favor.

Mr. MITCHILL had hoped that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, after the explanation of yesterday, would consent to the resolution; he would now add but a few explanatory words. The object of the resolution was simply to appoint an agent to inquire into the occupancy and titles of the present holders and claimants; this required a civilian versed in the municipal laws of the nations who had heretofore held that territory; not a natural historian, or mineralogist, not one who was acquainted with the art of mining, or smelting and testing ores. Neither did Mr. M. believe it would be necessary to send the agent to the mines themselves, but to the place where the deeds and conveyances constituting the title-papers of the proprietors, or pretended claimants, are recorded or preserved. Whether these were at New Orleans, or what other place, he did not know. As to the expense, it was not likely to exceed $1,000 or $2,000 even if the agent were sent from this city; but he imagined if the business could be as well conducted by the appointment of an agent in Louisiana; the President would instruct the Governor how to act. It might be seen too, from the words of the resolution, that it was a mere temporary employment, not likely to be of longer duration than three or four months, for the report is instructed to be made before the next meeting of Congress. Mr. M. concluded, that if Mr. LUCAS would reconcile himself to vote for the present motion upon this explanation, and should he hereafter desire a more extensive examination into the actual circumstances of the newly acquired Territory, he might rely upon his earnest co-operation.

Mr. LUCAS observed in reply, that Louisiana had been held alternately by three or four nations: each of which in sequence had granted titles to more or less of the lands in question. An examination into those titles would at this time excite a high degree of sensibility among the inhabitants, who, he thought, ought in their youthful state to be treated by Congress with tenderness and delicacy. The titles were various, some derived from the Governors of the country, some from commanders of posts. Many of the latter he believed might be considered by the agent illegal; especially as he had learned that the commander of St. Louis, in North Louisiana, held paramount authority over the subordinate posts, and that without his approbation the lands so granted would not be allowed; yet these persons who held under such title, and by occupancy and improvement consider themselves the bona fide proprietors of the lands. He feared that the inquiry intended by the resolution might create great dissatisfaction, while a postponement for the present could do no possible evil.

Mr. EARLY said, if Mr. L. had made a correct statement of the condition in which the titles in that country really stood, and he had no reason to doubt it, it would operate as the strongest reason on his mind to pass the resolution: though it would be perceived that the agency to be given on the present occasion extended no farther than to the lead mines. The gentleman, Mr. L., had yesterday mistaken his friend, Mr. MITCHELL's object, supposing a general agency was intended to be raised. He had mistaken him again to-day, by thinking the agent was to go into the Territory of Louisiana to decide upon the titles he might have an opportunity of examining. This was not the case. He was merely to inquire into the actual condition of the lead mines, the occupancy and title, for the information of Congress. We are not going to send a Board of Commissioners, or a Judiciary Establishment, for the purpose of hearing and determining upon the claims set up, but to procure for ourselves that information which will enable the Government to decide, without their instrumentality. If the gentleman (Mr. L.) views the subject in this point of light, he will find it freed from his objection.

The question was now put, and the resolution passed, 74 members voting in its favor.

THURSDAY, November 22.

Two other members, to wit: PETERSON GOODWYN and EDWIN GRAY, from Virginia, appeared and took their seats in the House.

A memorial of Samuel H. Smith, and others, on behalf of the Washington Building Company, was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will reconsider and ultimately decide on their petition, presented of January 3, 1803, praying that a law may pass to incorporate the said company, under certain rules and regulations intended for the improvement and ornament of the Metropolis of the Union; and, also, that they may be enabled to extend the application of the funds of the company to the insurance of buildings from fire.—Referred to Mr. LEWIS, Mr. JOHN RHEA, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. ARCHER, with leave to report thereon by bill, or bills, or otherwise.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the more effectual preservation of peace in the ports and harbors of the United States, and in the waters under their jurisdiction; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, on the expediency of exempting from impost all such books and philosophical apparatus as shall be imported on account of the Colleges and Universities existing within the United States, for the proper and exclusive use of the learned institutions; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported a resolution thereupon. The House proceeded to consider the said resolution, and the same being read, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

Mr. M. CLAY presented a petition from sundry citizens of Georgetown, stating that the channel of the Potomac was considerably obstructed below Mason's island by a mud bank recently formed, which did not allow more than thirteen and fourteen feet draught passed the same safely. And praying to be allowed to raise a tax not exceeding one per cent. on the real estate of the inhabitants, to be applied in erecting a causeway from the island to the Virginia shore, which they conceive would effectually cure the evil. They intended to obtain the consent of the owner of the island and the proprietors of the Virginia shore, who are the only persons that can possibly be injured by the work contemplated to be erected. Referred to the last mentioned committee.

HEALTH OF SEAMEN.

Mr. MITCHELL called the attention of the House for a few moments, while he explained a circumstance particularly interesting to the sailors of the United States. The eighth section of the act regulating the merchant service, &c., contained a regulation that vessels of one hundred and fifty tons or upwards, whose crews consist of ten men, should be obliged to carry a medicine chest. But the most dangerous part of our commerce to the health of seamen was that to the West Indies, and it is well known that the vessels engaged in that trade are under one hundred and fifty tons of course the care of the health of such seamen was entirely under the discretion of the merchants and captains, and however distressing it might be, yet the fact was so, that we lost one-tenth of our sailors, nay he believed one-eighth in that particular trade.

It was calculated that one-sixth of our seamen are in an incipient state of a disease, liable to break out on the passage, when they enter on board; of course all vessels ought to make a cautionary provision against the probable consequences. The danger of voyages to the West Indies, and other places, was so great as to preclude the youth of the middle States generally from engaging in a maritime life, and the deficiency was generally made up of foreign seamen; two-fifths of the crews from those ports—indeed he believed three-fifths—were composed of English, Irish, and Scotch, some of whom were naturalized, but others of them contrive to obtain protections without this probationary step, and perhaps it is owing in some degree to this circumstance that we are involved in every war they wage in these everlasting disputes with Great Britain. While he would take effectual care of the health of the seamen at sea, he would throw it out for consideration whether the medicine chest ought to be at the expense of the merchant or seamen. It will be recollected that seamen pay twenty cents a month, hospital money, to form a fund for their assistance in sickness on shore. He did not understand why they should not contribute to their own safety at sea—the captain generally performing the part of the physician in the latter case, as the hospital physicians did in that first mentioned. He moved the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures to inquire into the propriety of altering the law on this point, which was agreed to, and that they may report by bill or otherwise.

CHAIRMEN OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAWSON reported from the committee appointed for forming a rule of the House, respecting the mode of appointing chairmen to the standing and select committees. The principle was, that the member first named by the SPEAKER should be chairman; but in case of absence, or being excused by the House, the majority of the committee should choose one of the members chairman in his stead.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD wished to amend the resolution so that in the case of the excuse or absence of the first named member, the next on the list be the chairman, and in like manner the senior member be the chairman when the others are absent or excused; believing that this mode would provide for every case that could arise.

Mr. DAWSON thought the committee were the best judges of who was the most proper member of their own body to preside as chairman in any event of the absence or excuse of the chairman appointed by the SPEAKER.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD urged the adoption of an uniform system. The SPEAKER appoints the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, of the standing committees, and the select committees. He thought the principle ought to go through.

Mr. DANA did not consider the subject of much importance; but after the excuse by the House of the chairman of the Committee of Claims, another member was appointed in his stead. The second gentleman on the list declined, and the subsequent embarrassment arose. He stated what was, in his opinion, the Parliamentary rule, and wished a consistent rule to be fixed at this time, in hopes the question might be set at rest.

Mr. HOLMES wished to correct a part of the statement made by the gentleman who spoke last. He (Mr. H.) was the second person on the list of the Committee of Claims alluded to, but he did not decline the situation of chairman. The fact is, it had never been offered to him, and as he had doubts himself whether he was entitled to the chair, he called the committee together, and they confirmed his doubts by deciding that he had not. He would have it understood that he did not decline, and further, that he would never shrink from a duty which he was called upon to perform, or aspire to a situation to which he was not regularly called.

Mr. ELMER admitted the Parliamentary rule laid down by Mr. DANA, to be right; but he thought the SPEAKER merely nominated a chairman to the Committee of the Whole, under the pleasure of the House, who generally, by their silence, gave a tacit consent which constituted the appointment.

Mr. HOLLAND intended to vote against the amendment, and then against the resolution, with a view of adopting a different principle, viz: that the standing committees be chosen by ballot, and after being met, they should choose their own chairman.

Mr. ELLIOTT hoped the amendment would obtain, if it were only to prevent the motion threatened by Mr. HOLLAND, but he doubted if the amendment was altogether so definite as might be wished; the words senior member might be applied as well to a gentleman's age as to his standing on the list of the committee.

Mr. LEIB would prefer the amendment to the resolution as it stood, if for no other, yet for this one consideration: The committee, for example, consists of seven members, the chairman being absent, the six remaining members are then to vote for another chairman. Suppose they divide three and three, there is no decision, and they are then placed on the spot we now stand, and the question is left exactly as we found it.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD explained that the words "in like manner," alluded to the seniority or order in which the members' names stood on the list of appointment.

Mr. ELLIOT had not adverted to the words "in like manner," when he was up. He therefore withdrew his opposition.

Mr. SLOAN conceived there would be a consistency in another mode of appointment. The people appointed the House of Representatives, the House appointed the SPEAKER, and the SPEAKER or House may appoint their committees. Why then not let the committees appoint their own chairmen?

Mr. GREGG, after explaining what had heretofore been the practice, noticed the inconvenience of appointing the chairman of a committee chosen by ballot, and, for the sake of regularity, would vote for the amendment.

The question on the amendment being taken, was lost—forty-five only voting for it, and fifty-six against it.

On the question to agree to the resolution, the House divided—fifty in the affirmative, and fifty-six in the negative. Of course it also was lost.

Mr. HOLLAND offered his motion that all committees shall choose their own chairman, and it shall be incumbent on all persons, so chosen, to perform the duties of that function, unless excused by the House. This motion lies one day on the table as a matter of course.

FRIDAY, November 23.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to regulate the clearance of armed merchant vessels; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from SAMUEL L. MITCHILL, one of the members for the State of New York, stating "that the Legislature of the said State having appointed him a Senator of the United States, he had taken a seat in the Senate, and of course resigned his seat in this House."

The said letter was read: Whereupon the SPEAKER was requested to inform the Executive of the State of New York of the resignation of SAMUEL L. MITCHILL, one of the Representatives from that State.

Ordered, That Mr. LOWNDES be appointed of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures in the room of S. L. MITCHILL, who hath resigned his seat in this House.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of extending the time for claimants to lands under the State of Georgia, lying south of the State of Tennessee, to register the evidences of their title with the Secretary of State; and that the said committee report thereon to the House.

Ordered, That Mr. CLARK, Mr. CUTTS, and Mr. BRYAN, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. HOLLAND's motion of yesterday authorizing committees to appoint their own chairmen, was considered, and on the question, Will the House agree to the same? it passed in the negative, only thirty-three members voting in its favor.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD moved another resolution on the same subject, giving the committees power to elect their own chairmen if a majority was so disposed; if not, that the first named member shall be the chairman; in case of his absence or excuse, then the second; and if neither of these members were present, then the next member named on the list. This motion was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. EVSTIS to dispense with the standing rule of the House, it met an unanimous acquiescence, and the resolution was afterwards modified and agreed to as follows:

"That the first named member of any committee appointed by the Speaker or the House shall be the chairman, and in case of his absence, or being excused by the House, the next named member, and so on, as often as the case shall happen, unless the committee shall, by a majority of their number, elect a chairman."

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide, by law, for exhibiting and registering in proper offices, in the original language, and in the language used in the United States, all evidences of title and claim for land within the territories ceded by the French Republic to the United States, by the treaty of the thirtieth of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three, which have originated by virtue of any legal grant made by the French Government prior to the Treaty of Paris, of the tenth day of February, in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty-three; or of any legal grant made by the Government of Spain, subsequent to the convention made by and between the French Government and the Government of Spain, of the third of November, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-two, and prior to the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, of the first of October, one thousand eight hundred; or of any legal grant made by the British Government, subsequent to the said Treaty of Paris, of the tenth day of February, in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty-three, and prior to the Treaty of Peace of the third of September, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three.

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the committee appointed the 12th instant, on so much of the Message from the President of the United States as relates "to an amelioration of the form of government of the Territory of Louisiana."

MONDAY, November 26.

Another member, to wit: BENJAMIN TALLMADGE, from Connecticut, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Clerk, enclosing a letter addressed to him from the Rev. William Bentley, of Salem, in the State of Massachusetts, dated the sixteenth instant, declining to accept the appointment of one of the Chaplains to Congress, for the present session.—Ordered to lie on the table.

The petition of Benjamin Emmons, as agent of sixty associates, in Vermont, praying for a grant of land in Louisiana, for settlement, which was postponed at the last sessoin, was called up.

Mr. ELLIOT moved its reference to a select committee.

Mr. NICHOLSON thought it ought to go to the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message, which relates to the amelioration of the government of Louisiana, and asked if such a motion would be in order?

The SPEAKER said that both committees must be considered as select ones; and Mr. ELLIOT insisting on his motion, it was put and carried by a great majority, and a committee of seven appointed, viz:

Messrs. ELLIOT, CLOPTON, WHITEHILL, HASTINGS, PALMER, WINSTON, and BUTLER.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina. The bill was reported to the House with its amendments, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

PRESERVATION OF PEACE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the more effectual preservation of peace in the ports and harbors of the United States, and in the waters under their jurisdiction.

The first section authorizes the President and other proper officers to call in the aid of the militia, regular troops, or armed vessels, to execute civil process upon offenders who take refuge on board foreign armed vessels.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLSON, any commanding officer refusing to obey a requisition to this effect was subjected to a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD, observing in the latter part of the first section, the words "and if death en-

'sues on either side, those who are concerned in support of the civil authority shall be justified, and those engaged in resisting shall be punished as in cases of homicide committed in resisting a civil officer," wished to know what the punishment should be, as he did not recollect that Congress had heretofore ever made any law on this point, or perhaps it was intended to be punished under the State laws where the cases should arise; in the latter mode, the punishment would not be equal, for some States punish this offence with more severity, others more mildly. As this was a penal law he thought that great precision was expedient, so as to leave as little latitude as possible for construction.

Mr. NICHOLSON remarked that homicide committed in resisting a civil officer did not stand in their statute book; but the law of 1798, defining crimes and punishments in the exclusive territory of the United States, its forts, and arsenals, made provision for punishing manslaughter: he would agree to strike out the first and insert the last, and then the punishment would be uniform for crimes of the same species, viz: three years' imprisonment and one thousand dollars fine.

Mr. NELSON was sorry to differ from his colleague, (Mr. N.) on this point, but he could not view the trifling punishment of fine and imprisonment anywise adequate to the crime. Shall the murder of your officer in the execution of the duties of his office be commuted for fine and imprisonment? You fine your militia officer five thousand dollars for not going upon this service, and the man who kills him in resisting your process is fined one thousand dollars and imprisoned for three years. I should certainly recommend something more commensurate to the offence.

Mr. NICHOLSON remarked that homicide, happening in resisting a civil officer, was not considered in the bill as murder; of course the punishment of death was not the proper one, whether three years imprisonment and one thousand dollars fine was exactly what the punishment ought to be, he would not undertake to say. That, however, is the punishment to be inflicted on our citizens upon the commission of manslaughter. But gentlemen should remember that fine and imprisonment is not the only punishment to which such criminals would be liable—upon their arrest they are delivered over to be dealt with according to law. He should have no objection to let the punishment remain as it stood under the several States, but that he considered they were in a considerable degree unequal. The punishment of Maryland was different from that in New York, he believed, but he was not certain that it was milder in Pennsylvania. The punishment by death might defeat the object of justice; it being more than the offence deserved, juries would be inclined to mercy and acquit the criminal, in order to avoid taking his life upon their consciences. Liberty being one of the most desirable things on earth tends in some degree to justify, and if not to justify at least to diminish the offence, as flowing from the principle of self-defence.

Mr. NELSON would briefly state the case, and then he trusted his worthy friend would be of his opinion. They seemed to differ more about words than things. Manslaughter was a hasty killing upon a sudden affray; this, it is true, was never punished with death, either here or in England; but murder was a deliberate killing with malice prepense, and in case such killing take place in demanding an offender from on board an armed vessel and murder ensues, surely the party ought to suffer the punishment of a murderer. The crime of murder is not defined in any of the United States statutes; neither in Maryland, nor perhaps in the laws of any State in the Union; how then are we to come at the description of this offence, or distinguish it from manslaughter, but by a reference to the common and statute laws of England, from which we have borrowed all our legal definitions? Look into all the elementary writers on criminal law, and you will find that the crime of murder is aggravated when a civil officer is killed in the execution of his official duties by a person maliciously opposing the course of legal jurisdiction, and as a punishment he is deprived of life, as a person unworthy of being any longer a member of society; and the clause in the bill contemplates the apportioning of the punishment to this description of homicide, manslaughter, or murder; call it which you will, the effect is the same, and you must support your officers in the execution of their duty, or your laws will be without support.

Mr. EARLY.—The observation made by the gentleman from Maryland who has just sat down, (Mr. NELSON,) struck my mind very forcibly as deserving serious consideration; upon turning to the law of 1798, for the government of our forts, arsenals, &c., where the United States enjoy exclusive jurisdiction, I find that there is provision made as well for the case of murder as of manslaughter; now, with a view to make our penal law correspond throughout, I would suggest to the gentlemen engaged in the discussion, whether it would not be as well to strike out all the words from "resisting" in the thirty-eighth line to the end of the period, and insert in their place the following: "And in case such killing amounts to murder, it shall be punished with death—and in case such killing is only manslaughter, then such offender shall be imprisoned not exceeding three years, and fined not exceeding one thousand dollars."

Mr. RODNEY observed, that when a death ensues in the case mentioned by the bill, it must be murder. In ordinary cases between man and man, and death ensues by killing, it might be either murder or manslaughter. Where are we to resort for a meaning but as has been said, to the common law, as a known standard, uniform and invariable? The decisions in the courts of the several States, and their laws on this head, may vary; but the common law describes each of these crimes with accuracy. The definition is founded on the fact. If I take a life by beating a man with a weapon that may naturally be expected to produce death, and death ensues, then my using such a weapon proves malice prepense, for it is an illegal weapon. So if I resist an officer in the execution of his legal duty, and kill him in the resistance, it is also murder, for my resistance was illegal and implies malice. Then according to the language of this act, if death ensues, it is murder and not manslaughter. If a man strikes another upon a sudden heat, with a stick, upon the scull, and death ensues, it is manslaughter; but if he strikes with an iron crowbar it is murder; the intention being inferred from the weapon. While Mr. R. urged the propriety of classing the present offence with murder, and consequently punishing its commission with death, he would not be understood as an advocate for that kind of punishment. On the contrary, he was desirous of ameliorating these punishments, and introducing a system that should reform the offender, and restore him, after repairing his offence, to his family and his country; but this cannot at present be done; of course we must apply the rule of punishment as we find, it to make it general and uniform.

Mr. EARLY, while he concurred in the general doctrine laid down by Mr. R. respecting the common law, was not convinced that the manner in which they had been applied to this particular case was correct. It seemed to be Mr. R.'s opinion that no other offence than murder could be committed, if death ensued in resisting the officer; without seeking far, he would adduce one case where a resistance to death would amount only to homicide. Suppose the marshal or sheriff does not conform himself in all things to the instructions of the President, or that he demeans himself improperly, and death ensues, will it be held that the resistance and its consequence amounts to murder? No, certainly; but if he behaves properly, the killing is murder; hence this double provision is necessary to provide for the two cases.

Mr. DANA thought the embarrassment might be attributed to an attempt to combine in one section two different species of crimes, but it was exposed to objections which had not yet been made. The clause gives the marshal or sheriff the power to arrest the offender by force of arms, and then, if the persons resisting kill your officer, it is murder, and shall be punished accordingly. If, however, your officer and his armed force kill any of the offenders resisting, your process for it stands; if death ensues on either side, those who are concerned in support of the civil authority shall be justified, but those engaged in resisting shall be shot, or, if not shot, and they are taken alive, then they shall be fined and imprisoned for manslaughter committed upon their party. He did not think the amendments proposed, take which of them they might, likely to remove the difficulty.

Mr. NICHOLSON said the case they were about to provide for was different from any other that could arise in civil society. I was devising a punishment for persons who are armed with a species of power to resist a legalized force under their command, and, though they are bound to submit to our laws, yet they have others under their command who are bound to submit to them. An offender seeks protection from the effects of our offended laws on board an armed ship; he is sought by our officer, and the commanding officer, regardless of his proper duty, orders his sailors to defend themselves by resisting the process; in the struggle death ensues; now let it be asked, are those seamen guilty of murder or manslaughter? The servant of a person invested with authority equal to that of a British officer, and directed to do an illegal act, to kill a man for example, though it would be murder in the officer, yet it could be no more than manslaughter in the servant. The case is the same as it relates to the officer and crew; though the latter are not justified to do the act, yet they do not feel themselves justified to disobey their commander. When he was up before, he had not clearly expressed himself for want of attending to the bearing of the whole bill. In England every man's house was his castle; no officer was authorized to break a house open except in cases of treason or felony; an officer attempting it might be killed, and it would amount only to manslaughter. The attempt here to take a man from on board an armed ship might be considered as attempting to break open a castle, and if death ensued it would be manslaughter. The bill, however, authorized the force, and cases might exist in which the killing would be murder—other cases where the killing would be manslaughter only.

Mr. NELSON objected to Mr. EARLY's amendment, because it left the denomination of the crime to the judge or jury, and how could they determine whether it was murder or manslaughter but by the common law, as the United States had never yet defined either. If the case was defined and left to go to the jury, upon the matter of fact, the objection would be in some degree obviated.

Mr. NICHOLSON was sorry to see such a discussion had taken place. He would, in order to remove the difficulty, strike out all that related to the punishment, and leave them to be dealt with according to law, when delivered over to the civil authority.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD had two objections. First, that mentioned by his colleague. Where you authorize your sheriff or marshal to take an armed force, and as you justify these in case death ensues, and punish the others as murderers, the sheriff has only to order his men to fire and shoot some; then, for these deaths you hang the rest. This is making short work, and giving no quarter. The other objection was on the ground of the Constitution. He did not see that Congress had power to punish crimes committed against a State, or in its ports or harbors. The Constitution expressly gave Congress power to define and punish crimes and piracies committed on the high seas, but not within a State's limits.

Mr. SMILIE observed a great deal of embarrassment had taken place on wording the section; that, however, was not to be wondered at, as the bill had only just been distributed; but the last objection, that it was unconstitutional, deserved very serious reflection; he should, therefore, move the Committee to rise, with a view of giving time for consideration.

Mr. NICHOLSON had no objection to the Committee rising; but he would not have it understood that he had any Constitutional difficulties to struggle with. Congress had powers sufficient to enforce their revenue laws, and this very bill contemplates that as one circumstance that may occur, and to be corrected. But whence did the gentleman (Mr. R. Gaiswold) acquire this timidity, this care for State rights? It is believed they have not stood in his way on former occasions, any more than they did in the way of those with whom he acted. In the case of the sedition bill, which trenched upon the State Courts' jurisdiction, there was no squeamishness—the end justifying the means.

The Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

REMISSION OF DUTIES.

MR. J. RANDOLPH called for the order of the day on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means respecting the remission of duties on books imported for the use of colleges and seminaries of learning—the resolution declaring it to be inexpedient to allow the same.

The House taking the subject into consideration—

MR. J. RANDOLPH observed that the Constitution of the United States was a grant of limited powers for general objects, which Congress had no right to exceed, although they might think the powers too limited. This position, he considered as of primary importance. Its leading feature was an abhorrence of exclusive privileges; it might be called the key to that instrument; every thing which rose up in the shape of privilege, was repressed in a peculiar manner, whether it related to orders or classes of men. Whenever they have touched the doctrine of privilege, the framers of that instrument, and the people of the United States adopting it, have been careful that nothing should be got by inference, or construction; the privileges of this House even, have been precisely defined; and nothing is left for its extension, whatever may be the wishes or disposition of its members. The principle that this Constitution is but a limited grant of power occurs, if not directly, yet frequently and effectually, so that it cannot be mistaken. On the privilege asked for, to permit colleges and universities to import their books free of impost, we refer to the eighth section of the first article, where it is declared that Congress shall have power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises; but all duties, imposts and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States. The impost shall be uniform. It is a lamentable fact, but nevertheless it is a fact, and cannot be too much dwelt and insisted upon, nor too well known, that the ambiguity of language gives our Constitution that character which leaves it in the power of civilians to say it means any thing or nothing. Whatever may have been said on other points, I think in this instance the language is so definite that it cannot possibly be mistaken. They shall be uniform, that is to say, there shall be but one quantum, one mode of collecting, and one manner; there shall not be two measures to mete with. If Congress undertake to exempt one class of people from the payment of the impost they may exempt others also. If they begin with colleges and universities for the advancement of learning, surely they may go on to exempt the clergy and congregation for the advancement of religion; they may exempt their own members. Indeed it cannot be seen where they are to stop, having once overleaped the Constitutional barrier and entered on the wide field of privilege. The duties must be uniform! Nobody can be exempted: the President, if he chooses to import books, must pay the duty as well as any private citizen. In this country we have no privileged class, all must fare alike, every man must bend to the law, and the tax must be uniform whether on land or books.

Perhaps it may be said that the practice under the Constitution has decided against my construction; for philosophical apparatus is exempted from duty when imported for the benefit of seminaries of learning. I agree that philosophical apparatus is exempted by law; but I believe that law to be an unconstitutional law, as well as some others passed by former Congresses. But I do not wish to cast an odium upon its framers, more than they deserve; it might have passed through inadvertence or want of reflection, nay, it might have been the result of pure motives, the advancement of science and literature. Yet to show how intent the Constitution is to guard against powers drawn by construction even on this very subject, which it must have been solicitous to have extended, it has limited the efforts of Congress to promote literature and the useful arts by any other means than that of granting to authors and discoverers the exclusive use of their inventions, and publishing their works. And Congress have no power to promote the advancement of science or literature in any other than this particular way. If these observations are not received as reasons for the report of the committee, they will be considered as the justification of one of its members.

MR. FINDLEY observed, that in addition to the Constitutional objections urged, he had others on the ground of expediency. The country colleges and seminaries whose funds were small, had seldom or never an opportunity of importing books; they were happy to receive them in the country as donations, or by cheap editions; they would therefore receive no corresponding accommodation, and yet they were more useful and their use more universally felt than those called higher institutions, which claim to be exempted from paying impost. There are only a few of the well-endowed academies that can afford to procure foreign books, and when they have them, their circulation is extremely confined; to say nothing more, these reasons would engage me to support the resolution.

MR. R. GAIKWOLD.—The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) must have misunderstood me when he supposed I objected to the report because the committee had assigned no reason for the resolution: I mentioned the circumstance merely to show that we ought not then to decide

With respect to the Constitutional objection he has set up, I acknowledge it is new to me. Such an inquiry may be of great weight, but it does not appear so to me. The paragraph quoted from the eighth section of the first article, "that Congress shall have power to levy and collect taxes," has never struck me in the way it has that gentleman. The words are, "levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises;" but it drops the word taxes, it being settled in another part of the Constitution, and declares that duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform. The one speaks of direct taxes, the other of indirect—meaning that if an indirect tax is laid it shall be uniform. No one State is to have an excise laid upon its inhabitants unless it extends to the citizens of every other: one part is not to be excised and another excused. This has always been the construction of that section of the Constitution till the present moment; and I think it the true one. It is now said that Congress can only promote science and literature in one way. Why, have not Congress made grants of lands to promote those objects in the Western country? They have. I believe the power of Congress adequate to promote literature in the way applied for; and it has been frequently the case that, even after duties have been paid into the Treasury upon the uniform system, yet individuals have had those duties returned. I do not want to detain the House; but I am well persuaded that the Constitution forms no impediment, and the expediency must be apparent.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH believed the gentleman last up had misunderstood him; but it was not very material whether he was misunderstood or not, as Mr. GRISWOLD had not thought proper to answer him on the principal ground—namely, the Constitutional objection. He however said something: duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform. Can they be uniform, when a particular class or corporation are exempt from their payment? This is a new kind of uniformity: it is a species of uniformity I do not understand. He asks if you have not granted land and returned duties received into the Treasury? Indubitably you have. And we have the power, and in some instances the right, to give away the money in our Treasury to objects we think deserving. Have not all the dispositions gone upon the question of particular hardship? But tell me, do these individual cases, resting upon their own merits, class with a wholesale disposal of public money? Suppose you want to raise up an exclusive privilege in favor of, let us say shoemakers, and let them import their materials free of duty; will you bring up as precedent or authority the case of Mr. Messonier, or any other person? Can such a case, standing singular and isolated, be held up to promote the doctrine of exclusive privilege for a corps of thousands? Of lands, the United States have given General Lafayette some acres; they have given the like for schools in the Wilderness country; they may give some to the gentleman from Connecticut; but would any of them contend for an exemption from paying half or two-thirds of the price when the sale was made on a uniform system, and would they ask for an exemption from the payment of their tax if it was imposed? Mr. R. concluded by repeating the idea that if you once step over the barrier there is no security, and if you forgive or exempt the payment of the duties in this instance, Congress may forgive everything to their favorites, when they have any.

Mr. DANA made a reply to Mr. FINDLEY, but it is so difficult to hear gentlemen across the floor, that the Reporter dare seldom attempt to follow them. He considered Mr. FINDLEY's objection as being formed upon the idea that the books composing the libraries of colleges and universities were of the same kind as those used in country schools. Few things were more dissimilar. The one was merely to initiate the pupil in the first principles, the other took a more extensive range, embracing the whole circle of science, the classic authors, and the best writers, ancient and modern—books scarcely ever to be found but in collections attached to literary institutions—and the revenue arising from them may be called a tax upon seminaries of learning.

Mr. J. CLAY said he was one of the committee, and had agreed to the report. Since reasons had been called for, he would in a few words assign those which influenced him. The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DANA) mistakes in thinking that a denial to exempt books from impost is a tax on literary institutions, and therefore not uniform, as the Constitution requires all imposts should be; but he did not make his stand on the ground of the Constitution—he rested the question upon its expediency. Giving literary institutions the privilege of exemption from imposts would open a wide door for fraud: we should soon have them importing books for sale duty free, rivalling the booksellers, who are subjected to the payment of impost, and vending them in every street and avenue of the nation. But why privilege colleges and universities to accommodate the rich; for we may believe that the rich, and the children of the rich, are the only persons who have access to these collections? The poor have little leisure and less opportunity to improve the advantage which even neighborhood would give them to peruse works of the kind alluded to; and sure it would be thought unjust to tax their pittance of imported articles, in order to enable gentlemen to read the classic authors, or the sublime and beautiful of the modern writers.

Mr. FINDLEY spoke of colleges, not of universities. We have three in Pennsylvania—one of them, to be sure, has also the title of university—but two of them have not funds to import books on their own account. It is only rich institutions that have this advantage: the poorer class of seminaries buy of booksellers, and pay them the impost as well as their retail profit. Indeed, this remission of duties will rather tend to create disgust than give satisfaction; and those seminaries which have large collections of books would be induced to sell them at their present price in order to procure new ones cheaper, as they have had to pay the duty on the former, but would have none to pay upon those they should hereafter import.

H. OF R.

The question being called for, it was put on agreeing to the report of the Committee of the Whole, that it is inexpedient to remit the duty on books, and carried in the affirmative—seventy-nine members voting in the affirmative.

The House then adjourned.

TUESDAY, November 27.

Another new member, to wit: JOHN HOGE, returned to serve as a member for the State of Pennsylvania, in the room of William Hoge, who hath resigned his seat, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

An engrossed bill declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina was read the third time, and passed.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House, to whom was committed on the twenty-second instant, the bill for the more effectual preservation of peace in the ports and harbors of the United States, and in the waters under their jurisdiction, be discharged from the farther consideration thereof; and that the said bill be recommitted to Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. BROWN, Mr. GRIFFIN, Mr. RIKER, Mr. HUNT, Mr. SEAVER, and Mr. OLIN.

The House proceeded, by ballot, to the appointment of a Chaplain to Congress, on the part of the House, in the place of the Reverend WILLIAM BENTLY, who hath declined an acceptance of the said appointment; and upon examining the ballots, a majority of the votes of the whole House was found in favor of the Reverend WILLIAM PARKINSON.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means presented a bill making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in an appropriation for the support of Government during the present year, and making a partial appropriation for the same object, during the year one thousand eight hundred and five; which was twice read and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-day.

Mr. LEWIS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill authorizing the Corporation of Georgetown to make a dam or causeway from Mason's Island to the western shore of the river Potomac; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making an appropriation for the support of Government, during the present year, and making a partial appropriation for the same object, during the year one thousand eight hundred and five. The Committee reported the bill with several amendments thereto; which were twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. LEWIS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to incorporate the Washington Building and Fire Insurance Company; which was twice read and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

PORT OF NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, who were instructed by a resolution of the House, of the twelfth instant, "to inquire into the expediency of allowing, under proper regulations, a drawback of duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the port of New Orleans, from any port of the United States, and from thence exported to any foreign port or place," made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next. The report is as follows:

Upon examining the act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act for laying and collecting duties on imports and tonnage, within the territory ceded to the United States by the treaty of the 20th April, 1803, between the United States and the French Republic, and for other purposes," it appears that the sixth section refuses the drawback on all goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from the port of New Orleans, other, than on those which shall have been imported directly into the same, from a foreign port or place. Drawbacks have been allowed in all the ports of the United States, since the first acts were passed laying a duty on imports and tonnage. No inconvenience or loss has or can happen in giving back what we have received in cases where the article is really exported out of the limits of the United States, and many advantages have resulted from pursuing this policy. Our ports thus become the places of deposit for the merchandise of all nations. Our commerce with foreign countries is enlarged. Greater shipments of our own productions can be made. New employment can be given to our tonnage, already respectable and on a rapid increase, and as we necessarily import more than we consume, the surplus is again shipped to other countries. But if drawbacks are discontinued even in a single port, commerce must experience great embarrassments, or it will open for itself some new channels, where the streams of wealth may flow unimpeded and free from improper restraints, and other nations will reap advantages, which a different policy would unquestionably have secured to ourselves.

The duties, to their fullest amount, form a part of the value of all goods, and are always estimated in the price demanded from the consumer, or from the purchaser who intends to ship them for a foreign market; and it must be evident to every one, the least acquainted with the operations of commerce, that if any article is denied the drawback, the price will be depreciated to an equal amount with the original duties with which it may be chargeable.

New Orleans, not only as a port of deposit for the produce of the western country, where it can be shipped to all parts of the world, possesses peculiar and important advantages from its proximity to the British, French, and Spanish settlements in the West Indies. Various articles, whether of European, Asiatic, or American growth or manufacture, which we can readily supply at reasonable prices, can be carried to their ports, and be exchanged for such as they can conveniently spare, and which may be necessary for our own consumption. A commerce known to be highly beneficial to all the parties interested in it; supplying the United States too, in some cases with the precious metals, so necessary in our intercourse with Asia, it is presumed was not intended to be discouraged.

H. OF R.

If we place every description of goods, on a similar footing in relation to drawbacks, whether imported coastwise or direct from foreign countries, upon being exported out of the limits of the United States, the committee conceive we shall then have done all which will be necessary on this occasion. The committee therefore report, as their opinion, that so much of the act entitled "An act for laying and collecting duties on imports and tonnage within the territory ceded to the United States by the treaty of the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States and the French Republic, and for other purposes," as refuses the drawback on goods, wares and merchandise imported coastwise into New Orleans, and exported to foreign countries, ought to be repealed; and they submit a bill for the purpose.

MR. CROWNINSHIELD, accordingly, presented a bill repealing so much of the act, entitled "An act for laying and collecting duties on imports and tonnage within the territory ceded to the United States by the treaty of the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States and the French Republic, and for other purposes," as prohibits drawbacks of duties upon goods in certain cases; which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the whole House last appointed.

WEDNESDAY, November 28.

An engrossed bill making appropriation to supply a deficiency in an appropriation for the support of Government during the present year, and making a partial appropriation for the same object during the year one thousand eight hundred and five, was read the third time and passed.

POTOMAC RIVER.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing the Corporation of Georgetown to make a dam or causeway from Mason's island to the western shore of the river Potomac.

MR. MACON (Speaker) moved to strike out the first section of the bill, with a view of trying its merits.

MR. J. RANDOLPH seconded the motion of his respectable friend, (the Speaker.) The river Potomac was the joint property of the States of Maryland and Virginia under compact between those States. This property, at least on the part of Virginia, had never been relinquished: Congress, in his conception, had no right to pass the law in question; but if they had, there was another objection. The corporation of Georgetown were empowered to lay a tax which would be unequal and oppressive, since the property on which it was to be levied would not be equally benefitted by deepening the harbor, supposing that effect to be accomplished. He hoped a prompt rejection of the bill would serve as a general notice to the inhabitants of the District to desist from their daily and frivolous applications to Congress, to the great obstruction of the public business.

MR. SMILIE understood there was a rival interest between the towns of Alexandria and Georgetown, and as this rivalry had been exhibited on many former occasions, he deemed it proper, before they passed any bill for the encouragement of either place, that the parties should be obliged to publish their intentions some weeks before the application, that if there were any objections to the measure contemplated, they might be before the House at the same time. He stated this merely as a ground of postponement, not saying whether he was in favor or against the measure.

MR. GREGG thought the House bound to legislate for these people, until they relinquished the claim to the jurisdiction, either by authorizing them to legislate for themselves, or retroceding them to the States to which they originally belonged. He approved of the idea of publishing, as expressed by his colleague, (MR. SMILIE,) which he considered absolutely necessary. If Alexandria were opposed to the bill, it is probable they would have sent in a memorial on the subject before this time; their not having done so inclined him to believe that they were satisfied that the measure should go into operation. He did not think the bill perfect, but nevertheless he should not oppose its progress.

MR. LEWIS said the landholders of Georgetown had very generally signed the petition to Congress: And no person out of the walls of this House gave it opposition. The people of Alexandria were content, and the owner of the island and the west shore of the river was the person most likely to be affected, yet he had given it his hearty assent. He was well persuaded that no injury would be done to the navigation of the Eastern branch, or to the port of Alexandria; if therefore they could render a benefit to Georgetown, without injuring any other property, he trusted the House would agree to the bill.

MR. SLOAN felt interested in the result of this measure. The people here have nobody to look to but Congress to make Legislative provision for their well-being; he therefore considered it a duty to attend to their desires; but he wished the applicants to give notice of their intentions, in order that any person conceiving himself likely to be aggrieved should have an opportunity of being heard. This was the usual course pursued in the State where he resided.

MR. CLAIBORNE was by no means satisfied that the removal of the mud bank would do no injury to the Eastern branch and to Alexandria.

MR. NELSON said that, on a question so important to the upper parts of Maryland and Virginia, he could not refrain from stating some reasons in favor of the measure, and against the motion of the Speaker, which was intended to destroy the bill. It had been urged that the sediment, which now obstructed the navigation to Georgetown, if set afloat, by increasing the current and volume of water across it, would impede the navigation of the Eastern branch or fill up the harbor of Alexandria. Those who would take a view of the Eastern branch would be convinced it could make no deposit there, it being intercepted or turned aside by the point which projected into the Potomac; and as the water of the Eastern branch was more rapid than the Potomac, the breadth of the latter being much wider than the former, there certainly was no danger to be apprehended in that quarter. As to Alexandria, it was not to be supposed that the solid mass of sediment was to be taken off the bar at once and lodged in that harbor; the probability was, it would remove gradually and deposit at the eddy on each side the river, while the union of the Eastern branch with the Potomac would increase the celerity of the current and carry it far below Alexandria.

The compact mentioned by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) between the States of Maryland and Virginia he acknowledged to exist; but as the measure contemplated the improvement of the navigation of the Potomac, instead of obstructing it, the right of each State to the free navigation thereof remained unimpaired. He imagined that the inhabitants of Alexandria and the citizens of Virginia wished success to the measure. He knew his constituents had it much at heart, knowing that a choice of markets is a great accommodation to farmers; and if defeated, it would be as much to their advantage to bring their produce to a shipping port at once by land, as to use the canal recently constructed at such prodigious expense, having afterwards to go with their produce to Alexandria by land.

Mr. SMILIE should not be against the bill, if upon full and fair inquiry it was found proper to pass it. But he could not agree to be hurried along without allowing time to acquire information. He therefore moved that the Committee rise and report progress.

Mr. MACON (Speaker) opposed the rising of the Committee, because it was leaving the business exactly where it stood, unless it was meant to recommit it to a select committee for modification. But as he was determined to vote against it in any and every shape, he was prepared to decide now. As to the mode he had taken to come at his object, he should only say it was a fair one, and such as had been the uniform practice of the House since he had a seat in it.

The gentlemen in favor of this dam or causeway, say it will do no harm; but where is the demonstration? On the other side, serious apprehensions are entertained of its injurious effects upon the United States navy yard in the Eastern branch, and its causing obstructions in the harbor of Alexandria. He would assure the committee he was ready to promote the welfare of any of the citizens; but it must in justice be done, without injuring any other portion whatever.

At the last session, an application was made for a permanent bridge across the Potomac, with a draw for the passage of vessels; the petitioner urged the general utility of the measure to all persons travelling North or South, but particularly the vast benefit accruing to the inhabitants of the District, by affording a solid and secure means of intercourse between its several parts. This measure was opposed by the present petitioners, on the ground of the compact between Maryland and Virginia, securing the right of free navigation to the river, and also alleging that their navigation to Georgetown would be impeded. The argument which they applied then, now applies against them, and it ought, in the minds of the same legislators, apply with equal success.

Mr. FINDLEY was rather in favor of the bill, believing the mode proposed would be successful in deepening the channel, which would certainly improve the navigation to and from Georgetown, and in that object the citizens of some of the western counties of Pennsylvania were materially interested; several of their boatable creeks nearly interlocking with those of the Potomac. He would however agree to the Committee rising, with a view to postpone the bill, until gentlemen acquired the information they asked for.

Mr. GODDARD hoped the Committee would rise, and the subject be postponed until sufficient light was obtained to guide their votes to a proper decision. He also hoped that no member might be considered as the friend or the foe of the present bill, until he became such by an examination into its merits or demerits. He narrated the course the business had taken since its introduction into this House, and inferred that the same deliberate mode ought to be pursued to the end. Whether the measure was good or evil could only be determined in that way, and gentlemen ought not to reject doing positive good, unless it was demonstrated that positive evil would result to counterbalance the good that was intended. He conceived the members ought to inquire for themselves on this point, and legislate accordingly. He would on all occasions endeavor to promote the interests of the District; and as it had no immediate representative on the floor, he considered every representative bound to serve them, while the seat of Government remained among them.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL would not declare whether he should vote for the final passage of the bill or not. But he was disposed to take notice of the applications made from time to time by the inhabitants of the District; whether to redress grievances, or procure benefits. But he by no means approved of the principles of legislation without representation. He regretted that they were placed in this unfortunate situation; but he should decide on the present question according to its merits; and if it was found to be of great consequence to the petitioners, and not likely to work an injury to others, he presumed the bill would finally pass. But he wished the Committee to rise, in order to give further time to obtain information. It had been alleged that the friends of the measure ought to demonstrate that the erection of a causeway would do no injury to any one. This was not a fair position; it was requiring them to prove a negative. The burden of proof should lie on those who oppose the bill, and it was for them to demonstrate that injury would result. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. J. RANDOLPH) has stated that the boats from the western country have a choice of passing by the western or eastern channel to the market below Georgetown, and this, it is presumed, he means they should be still entitled to under the compact between Maryland and Virginia. Let us hear from those persons also, and then ascertain whether they have any objection to the project on that account. This was also an argument in favor of the rising of the Committee, and perhaps it may be added, that a little delay will enable the House so to modify the bill as to render it less exceptionable than at present.

Mr. SOUTHARD had not considered this subject of much consequence in the outset, but he found that its importance increased as it toiled along. He thought this morning it would have occupied but a short portion of their time; in that he found himself deceived; and he believed he was not singular in these opinions. He suspected many other members were in the same predicament. He therefore would vote for the Committee's rising. That navigable waters are considered as highways, is a matter of great notoriety; but he did not know that to deepen a channel, by contracting its surface, was considered as obstructing the free navigation of a river; nor could he conceive that the body of sediment meant to be removed, would descend en masse and deposit itself at the confluence of the next stream it met. On the contrary, he imagined it would be separated by the force of the current giving it action into millions of particles, some of which would settle promiscuously on either side, while a part would ultimately be deposited in the ocean.

The Committee hereupon rose and reported progress, and asked leave to sit again. On the question, shall the Committee have leave to sit again?

Mr. J. RANDOLPH requested that the act of cession by Virginia might be read, by which it would clearly appear that she had not ceded, or intended to cede to the United States any right acquired under her compact with Maryland. [The act was read.]

It is plain from the preamble, said Mr. R., that the intention of the State was to make a cession above the tide water; that the expected seat of Government would be fixed in some place contiguous to the limits of Maryland and Pennsylvania. It is not contended that the United States were bound to select any particular spot. This circumstance is mentioned only to show what was contemplated at the time by the Legislature of Virginia. Her act of cession was more broad. It extended to any tract of country not exceeding ten miles square, "to be located within the limits of the State." Over this she had relinquished to Congress her jurisdiction as well of soil as of persons. But her limits did not extend beyond high water mark on the western bank of the Potomac. Her right of highway on the river was a natural right acknowledged and secured by convention with Maryland. Her civil jurisdiction over its waters was a conventional right, entirely derived from compact with that State, was a jurisdiction not within her limits, and which the words of the act just read could not embrace or convey.

Mr. Dawson would vote against the Committee having leave to sit again. He was convinced that the objection made by his colleague (Mr. J.

RANDOLPH) was conclusive: the fact was, that neither Maryland nor Virginia had ceded their joint rights to this river, nor could they do so, by their separate acts. The terms of the compact requiring that anything done respecting the navigation of the Potomac, should be done by their joint act. It was worthy of remark, that the petitioners for the causeway were the identical persons who petitioned against the bridge as a violation of the compact between the two States, and denying the authority of Congress to legislate on the subject of the navigation of the Potomac. He thought them right then, and he voted against the bridge. His opinion had not changed with their opinions, and, therefore, he should vote against the causeway now.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD said that from the vote just taken he presumed that the question of expediency had been settled. But it is now objected that Congress have no exclusive jurisdiction over the Potomac. In reply he would submit a few observations. By the Constitution, Congress were empowered to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over any place not exceeding ten miles, which might be ceded by particular States. The States of Maryland and Virginia had ceded this District to Congress, and the cession had been accepted. But the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) had said that Virginia did not cede the jurisdiction of the Potomac, because she did not own it separately. To this he would answer that the river Potomac must have been under the jurisdiction of either Maryland or Virginia or both. And as both allowed Congress to accept of any part of their territory not exceeding ten miles square, and Congress had chose to accept of part from one and part from the other, he presumed the jurisdiction of the Potomac, let it have been held by either of the States, or jointly, must have passed to the United States. He was of opinion, that if Congress had no jurisdiction over the Potomac, they had none over the District. The Constitution provides only for the cession of one district of country not exceeding ten miles square. The act of Congress made in pursuance of the Constitution had also provided for the laying out one district. If the arguments of the gentleman from Virginia were correct, and Congress had no jurisdiction over the Potomac, the Commissioners and the then President of the United States, under whose direction the district was laid off, had been mistaken, and had taken two districts of territory instead of one. This being the case, Congress had no jurisdiction in the District, because it not being laid off conformable to the Constitution and the law of Congress, the acceptance by Congress was absolutely void. If this was correct, there was an absolute necessity for giving leave to the Committee to sit again, for the purpose of deliberating whether Congress had jurisdiction or not. If they had not, and were legislating for the people of the District without authority, the sooner they put an end to such an assumption of power the better.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH declared that the opinion which he had just given was the result of his most deliberate judgment. To what it might lead he should not at that time undertake to determine; but when that question should come before the House he was not sure that he should deny the corollary of the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. R. GRISWOLD,) at least as far as related to the testimony on the other side of the river. The question, however, then was, whether Congress possessed exclusive jurisdiction over the Potomac. How could they acquire it? From Maryland? It was more than she had to give. At farthest she could only grant her own qualified right. Had they obtained it from Virginia? not at all. She had granted a jurisdiction exclusively her own, over a tract of country within her limits. And could any man pretend to say that this was a grant of her concurrent jurisdiction over the Potomac, confessedly without her limits? She had, to use the expression, issued her warrant to Congress, to be located somewhere within the State, and, under this pretext, her property out of the State was about to be usurped. Suppose the gentleman from Connecticut were to convey by deed his exclusive property, by certain metes and bounds, would his joint interest in other property not contained within those bounds pass by such a deed? Surely not. To a person setting up a claim to such property he would probably say, produce the evidence of your title; and in like manner Mr. R. demanded to be shown the conveyance by which Virginia had relinquished her concurrent jurisdiction over the Potomac? And in answer to this, gentlemen refer to a conveyance relinquishing something else in nowise connected with it, and tell us we always believed that we had a grant for this jurisdiction; we shall be grievously disappointed if we have not; it will be a great inconvenience to us to do without it; and, therefore, we must have it. And Virginia is to be forcibly dispossessed of her right, to suit the convenience of Congress.

Mr. NELSON said, it was with diffidence he again troubled the House after the lengthy discussion which had taken place. But doubts having been originated as to the authority of Congress to pass the bill in question, he felt compelled to remove those doubts, as far as lay in his power. As the House had decided the expediency of the measure by a large majority, if upon an investigation it should be demonstrated that Congress possessed ample power to pass the bill, he trusted the same majority would still be found in favor of it. He would proceed to examine the power which Congress possessed to pass the bill, and he trusted that he should be able to satisfy a majority of the House, that they had sufficient power. Previous to the compact between Virginia and Maryland, which had been so much talked of, Maryland claimed the sole jurisdiction of the Potomac river, and Virginia claimed Cape Henry and Cape Charles, also the jurisdiction of the Pocomoke as her property. In order to prevent any duties from being imposed upon their vessels at either of those places, the two States entered into a compact by which Maryland agreed that the navigation of the Potomac should be free to the people of Virginia, and Virginia contracted not to impose duties on the vessels of Maryland coming by Cape Henry, or navigating the Pocomoke. By this compact, the Potomac became the joint property of Maryland and Virginia as to the free navigation, but all the islands were under the jurisdiction of Maryland. This being the situation, each of these States, by a law, ceded to Congress any part of their territory not exceeding ten miles square, which they might choose to accept. Congress chose to accept of part from one and part from the other; and, among the rest, this joint property the river Potomac. There was no exception made in the act of cession as to the water courses, and it would be needless to inform the members that a grant of land necessarily carried with it a grant of the waters thereon, unless an exception was made.

But, it had been said, that this being joint property, neither of the States had the power to grant it to Congress, and they had not done it jointly. To this, he would answer, that each State had granted to Congress all their right at different times, and Congress having accepted of it, the whole had vested in them. If two persons, to wit, A and B, are possessed of joint property and A grants the whole to C, the moiety passed thereby. After this, if B grants the whole to C also, his part passes by the grant, and C becomes proprietor of the whole. This was exactly similar to the present case. But he would ask gentlemen if the jurisdiction of the Potomac was not in Congress, in the body of what county was it? If not in Alexandria or Washington counties, it could be in no county. Suppose, then, a crime should be committed on the river, in the body of what county should the indictment state the crime to have been committed? It could not be in the county of Fairfax or Montgomery, because the parts of those counties adjacent to the river had been ceded to Congress. Then, if the doctrine contended for by gentlemen was correct, no offence could be committed on the Potomac, as far as the limits of the District extend, and it would become a sanctuary for crimes. He trusted this was not the case, but that the river was, by the cessions, granted to Congress, and was in Washington and Alexandria counties. He considered the argument of his colleague (Mr. NICHOLSON) that Virginia had no property in the river, which she could cede, of no avail; because, if that was the case, Maryland owned the whole, and Maryland had ceded it to Congress. He hoped the Committee would be granted leave to sit again.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—The gentleman asks in the body of what county is the river Potomac passing through the District of Columbia? Will he take it for an answer that its jurisdiction is within the bodies of the same counties it was in before the acceptance of the territory on each side?

In addition to the observations made on passing joint property with exclusive property, suppose England and France to hold Malta in joint possession, and that they cede to Germany, for her acquiescence in that measure, some of the exclusive property held by each within the German empire, will they say that their joint property in Malta passed by the treaty?

Mr. CLARK was unwilling to trouble the House at that late hour with any remarks, and would have entirely forborne, was not the question on which we were about to decide, and which had become extremely important, susceptible of a position which it had not assumed. It had been stated, and generally agreed to, and he supposed was correct, that the State of Maryland, previous to her compact with Virginia, rightfully claimed the whole river Potomac to the high-water mark on the western bank. Virginia owned the Capes. This collision of interest produced, in the year 1786, an adjustment of their interfering interests, and it was expressly stipulated that the river Potomac should remain a highway, free for the navigation of each State. In the year 1799, the Legislature of Virginia passed a law making a cession to the United States of a territory ten miles square, or any less quantity that should be accepted for the seat of the General Government, to be located and laid off within her limits; thus by the terms of her cession confining it to her territory. Maryland, nearly at the same period, made a similar cession. Out of these two cessions is the present Columbian Territory made. It is contended by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. NELSON,) that the two States uniting in the cession makes the grant complete, and the right in the United States predominant and exclusive. He acknowledges, at the same time, this correct principle that they could grant no greater right than they possessed. This doctrine, I hold incontrovertible, that the alienor can have no greater or better title than the alienor, otherwise the derivative would be superior to the original title, a principle not to be admitted.

Let it be distinctly recollected that, prior to the cession, Virginia had purchased a right out of the soil of her sister State, distinct from the land—an incorporeal hereditament, a franchise which she had the right of exercising, unconnected with the use of the soil—so that, while Maryland owned the land, Virginia owned the right of way. She never passed this right by the terms of her cession or by any other act. Maryland could not, having already parted from it. No strength of argument can be derived from the terms of the Constitution; for, if Virginia never parted with her right, the United States could never have acquired it. I trust I have shown that Virginia purchased a right in the navigation of the Potomac, which she never parted from, and, of course, retains to this moment. We, therefore, cannot constitutionally legislate on this subject.

Let it not be said that the object is improvement and not obstruction. Is not building the wall from Mason's island to the Virginia shore an obstruction, and the improvement at best problematical? But, this is begging the question. On a fair admission of my construction, I contend, and have endeavored to prove, that we, possessing no jurisdiction over the river, it cannot be touched by any Legislative act of ours in any point whatever. For, if it be touched in one way, it may be in another, and may finally end in whatever arrangement Congress may think expedient to make.

He had another objection to the bill. This might be but the commencement of a scheme which should compel all boats coming down the Potomac to unlade their cargoes here. This would be effected by obstructions in the river above, and a canal terminating in a basin in this city; thus diverting to the exclusive benefit of Washington, all the labor and expense which had been jointly incurred by Maryland and Virginia for opening the navigation of the river Potomac. When the Constitution of the United States was under consideration, that section which gave Congress exclusive legislation over a district not exceeding ten miles square, to be afterwards ceded to them, was viewed with a jealous eye. It was regarded by some of the best and greatest men who ever had lived, or who, he believed, ever would live, as the germ of incalculable mischief, as the ambush from which the masked monarchy of the Constitution was to spring upon the people. At one time, this prediction seemed to be verifying itself. Accordingly, we had seen a city laid out on a gigantic scale. Edifices the most stupendous were planned. We seemed determined not only to vie with Paris or London, but to rival Thebes or Babylon of old. Happily these splendid visions had ended in a monstrous abortion. He wished to see the people of the District restored to their rights. So long as they remained in their present condition, he should be averse to promote the growth of a city, which he considered to be as much the nursery of despotism as the Newcastle trade of England was of seamen.

Mr. JACKSON did not stop to inquire whether it was proper for Congress to retain the jurisdiction over this District, but he was willing to remove a grievance which the people complained of and required to be done. He was not one of those who was disposed to guard the people against their worst enemies, themselves, as he did not believe the doctrine to be true. The objection that Virginia and Maryland had only ceded their exclusive property, and not the joint property of the free navigation of the Potomac, might, perhaps, be extended further than gentlemen wished, or were aware of. By the Treaty of Paris, France had ceded Louisiana in full sovereignty to the United States, but expressly reserved the right of free navigation of the Mississippi; if, then, the United States were disposed to shorten the navigation by cutting through the bend of that river, or in any other way improve the same, will it be necessary for the United States to consult and obtain the assent of France to the measure before they ventured to put it in execution?

Mr. NICHOLSON had but few observations to make upon the question before the House. His opinion was the same as at the last session when a petition was presented for the erection of a bridge. He then thought that the erection of a bridge over the Potomac would tend much to the improvement of the place. He thought so still. But he then thought that Congress had no right to interfere in the least with the free navigation of the Potomac, and, of course, was opposed to the bridge. The same reason operated, in his mind, against the bill now in question. Neither of the States of Maryland or Virginia could have passed such a law previous to the cession of the District to Congress. The question to be determined, then, was "whether the jurisdiction of the Potomac was ceded to Congress." If this should be answered in the negative by the Committee, all questions as to the expediency of the measure would be at an end. Previous to the compact between Virginia and Maryland, the latter claimed the river Potomac as its exclusive property. By that compact it was declared that the navigation of the said river should be free. Virginia, therefore, acquired a kind of property in the river, inasmuch as she acquired the right to the free navigation thereof. The question, then, to be inquired into, was, Had Virginia parted with this right? He conceived she had not. By the act authorizing the cession of ten miles square or less to the United States, this could not have been done; Virginia had no power to make the cession of the Potomac, because she had not the jurisdiction over it, and could not grant more than she possessed. After this grant by Virginia, the State of Maryland granted to Congress a portion of territory not exceeding ten miles square for the seat of Government. Had Maryland the sole property in the river it could have passed, in this grant, provided Congress accepted that part of her territory. But she had not this sole property, because the State of Virginia had a right by compact to the free navigation thereof. How, then, had the United States acquired the jurisdiction over the Potomac? Would it be contended that they had acquired it from Maryland? This did not appear from the act of cession. Had they acquired it from Virginia? That could not be, because Virginia had no power to make such a grant. So long as he had the honor of a seat in the House, he would hold up his hands against any measure like the present, which would go to affect the rights of any of the States. If Congress had a right to interfere in the least with the free navigation of the Potomac, they had a right to stop it altogether. He conceived they had no right to pass any law on the subject; and, believing so, he would certainly vote against the Committee having leave to sit again.

NOVEMBER, 1804.

Armed Merchant Vessels.

H. OF R.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD was of opinion that due notice ought to have been given by the applicants of their intention to petition Congress on the subject, that private property might not be injured without the knowledge of the owners; he believed the causeway might be of use, but he was not a competent judge; but others very probably would be benefited besides the inhabitants of Georgetown, and he thought it reasonable that such should likewise contribute to the expense. Till these circumstances should be ascertained, he would vote against the Committee having leave to sit again.

On motion the Committee rose and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, November 29.

A petition of sundry citizens of the United States, and inhabitants of the Territory of New Orleans, was presented to the House and read, stating their approbation of the government prescribed for that Territory, by an act passed at the last session of Congress; and praying that, whenever the said Territory of Orleans shall, consistent with the Constitution of the United States, be admitted as a State into the Union, such conditions may be annexed to the admission as will secure to the petitioners the use of their native language in the Legislative and Judicial authorities of the same.—Referred.

A representation of sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts was presented to the House and read, stating a claim for the value of certain lands purchased by them under an act of the Legislature of Georgia, passed in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, which have since been ceded to the United States, and praying that the subject-matter of their said claim may be taken into the immediate consideration of Congress, and a speedy decision had thereon.

Ordered, That the said representation be referred to Mr. VARNUM, Mr. MERIWETHER, Mr. TIBBITS, Mr. THOMAS M. RANDOLPH, and Mr. NELSON; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is expedient for Congress to recede to the State of Virginia the jurisdiction of that part of the Territory of Columbia which was ceded to the United States by the said State of Virginia, by an act passed the third day of December, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, entitled "An act for the cession of ten miles square, or any lesser quantity of territory within this State, to the United States in Congress assembled, for the permanent seat of the General Government;" provided the said State of Virginia shall agree thereto.

Resolved, That it is expedient for Congress to recede to the State of Maryland the jurisdiction of that part of the Territory of Columbia within the limits of the City of Washington, which was ceded to the United States by the said State of Maryland, by an act passed on the nineteenth day of December, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, entitled "An act concerning the Territory of Columbia and the City of Washington;" provided the said State of Maryland shall consent and agree thereto:

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to a Committee of the whole House on Wednesday next.

ARMED MERCHANT VESSELS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to regulate the clearance of armed merchant vessels.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That, after due notice of this act at the several custom-houses, no merchant vessel armed, or provided with the means of being armed at sea, shall receive a clearance, or be permitted to leave the port where she may be armed or provided, without bond, with two sufficient sureties being given by the owner or owners, or by the master or commander, to the use of the United States, in a sum equal to double the value of said vessel, conditioned that such vessel shall not make or commit any depredation, outrage, unlawful assault, or violence, against the vessels, citizens, subjects, or territory of any nation in amity with the United States: Provided, That the regulations herein contained shall not be construed to extend to vessels bound to any port or place in the Mediterranean, or beyond the Cape of Good Hope.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, if any armed merchant vessel clearing for any port or place within the Mediterranean, or beyond the Cape of Good Hope, shall make or commit any depredation, outrage, or unlawful assault, or violence, as aforesaid, on her voyage to or from, or at any place to which she may be bound, such vessel, with her arms and cargo, or the value thereof, shall be forfeited to the use of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, on satisfactory evidence or information being given to the collector of any port that any vessel within the same is armed or arming, or provided with the means of being armed at sea, for the purpose of committing any unlawful act as herein before expressed, or of carrying on by force of arms, any unlawful commerce, it shall be the duty of such collector to detain such vessel until the case be submitted to the President of the United States, who is hereby authorized to cause such vessel to be disarmed, or to order a clearance to be granted, as he shall judge proper.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD moved to amend the first section of the bill in such manner as to prevent armed merchant vessels from clearing out for one port and sailing for another; it would prevent a deviation from the true voyage.

Mr. J. CLAY thought this alteration would extend beyond what was the true object of the bill; it might interrupt the European trade, while it was only intended to prevent the forced trade to St. Domingo. He suggested an amendment to the amendment, viz: to confine the forfeiture of armed vessels clearing from one port of the West Indies, and which shall proceed to any other port or place than that of her original destination.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD moved, then, to strike out the whole of the second section. He thought it unreasonable to forfeit the cargo as well as the vessel, her arms, tackle, and furniture.

Mr. RODNEY asked whether the Committee would not be put to greater inconvenience by striking out the section than by amending it?

On the question to strike out, it was lost—only thirty-two voting for the motion.

Mr. J. CLAY then moved to insert the amendment he had suggested, adding thereto, "unless compelled by stress of weather." The sole object being to confine the regulation of the clearance of armed vessels to those destined to the West Indies.

On a division, Mr. J. CLAY'S motion was agreed to—yeas 62.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD then offered another amendment, to extend the regulation of the clearance of armed merchant vessels to the Mediterranean and beyond the Cape of Good Hope.

Mr. J. CLAY did not see the necessity of this amendment, as vessels bound to those places never touched at the West Indies.

On the question, only 24 members were in favor of the motion; of consequence, it was not carried.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD then moved to strike out that part which related to the forfeiture of the cargo, in which he was supported by

Mr. EUSTIS, who represented it as an enormous hardship upon the owner to put at risk four or five hundred thousand dollars, for which he was to give sureties, and which might be the value of the cargo.

On the question, the word cargo was struck out; 71 being in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. EUSTIS, after the words in the first section that they "should not commit any depredation, outrage, unlawful assault, or violence," these words were added, "nor make any other unlawful use of her arms."

Mr. E. suggested the propriety of adding a new section to the bill, to extend the security against the commander making also an improper use of the arms intrusted to him, or selling them to others in the West Indies.

A question was, however, previously taken on a motion to strike out what respected the forfeiture of the cargo in the fourth section, which the mover observed he would not have made but that the words had been stricken out of the second section; his own private judgment being that the cargo, as well as the vessel, should be forfeited for an improper use of their arms; but he moved it for the sake of consistency.

On the question, there were 51 for striking out, and 40 in the negative.

Mr. EPES thought the bill founded on erroneous principles. Instead of permitting our merchantmen to arm and afterwards punishing them for the abuse of those arms, he conceived it would be infinitely more prudent and politic to restrain them altogether from arming.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH, fully impressed with the importance of the ideas suggested by Mr. EUSTIS in relation to selling their arms and vessels in the West Indies, or, rather to the people of St. Domingo, thought it would be better for the Committee of the Whole to rise, report the amendments, that the House might incorporate them into the bill, and direct the whole to be printed.

This course was accordingly pursued, and the bill made the order for Wednesday.

FRIDAY, November 30.

A petition of sundry citizens of the county of Washington, in the State of Pennsylvania, was presented to the House and read, complaining of an undue election and return of JOHN HOGG, to serve in this House as one of the Representatives for the said State.—Referred to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter addressed to him from the Reverend WILLIAM PARKINSON, dated the twenty-ninth instant, declining to accept the appointment of one of the Chaplains to Congress for the present session.—Ordered to lie on the table.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting copies of the treaties concluded between the Delaware and Piankeshaw Indians for the extinguishment of their title to the lands therein described.

The Message was read, and, together with the papers, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee to whom was committed the bill for the more effectual preservation of peace in the ports and harbors of the United States, and in the waters under their jurisdiction, reported an amendatory bill; which was read twice and referred to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

A memorial of Perez Morton and Gideon Granger, in behalf of the holders of the title of the Georgia Mississippi Company to lands lying within the territory ceded by the State of Georgia to the United States, was presented to the House and read, stating that the claimants to the said lands are ready to enter into a negotiation for a compromise of their claims, agreeably to the conditions and limitations of the cession of Georgia, with any Commissioners who may be authorized thereto by the Government of the United States; the claimants reserving all their rights at law, in case the compromise should not be effected; and praying that Congress will come to a final determination on the subject, that the said claimants may no longer be exposed to a fruitless and expensive pursuit of what they conceive to be their rights.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the committee appointed yesterday, on a representation of sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill repealing so much of the act, entitled "An act for laying and collecting duties on imports and tonnage within the territory ceded to the United States by the treaty of the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States and the French Republic, and for other purposes," as prohibits drawbacks of duties upon goods in certain cases. The Committee reported the bill with several amendments, which were twice read, and agreed to by the House.

The said bill was then further amended at the Clerk's table, and, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed and read the third time on Monday next.

The House proceeded, by ballot, to the appointment of a Chaplain to Congress, on the part of this House, in the place of the Reverend WILLIAM PARKINSON, who hath declined an acceptance of the said appointment; and, upon examining the ballots, a majority of the votes of the whole House was found in favor of the Reverend JAMES LAURIE.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to revise the rules and articles for the government of the Army of the United States; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. VARNUM, Mr. MATTHEW CLAY, Mr. TALLMADGE, Mr. PATTERSON, and Mr. BUTLER, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE CHASE.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed on the 6th inst. reported articles of impeachment against Judge Chase. They were nearly the same as reported at the last session except the fifth and sixth articles, which are new ones.

Mr. R. moved to refer them to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. ELLIOT rose to move a more distant day, and to assign his reasons for the motion. It had been to him a subject of considerable regret that the present report had been so long delayed, and he had repeatedly examined his own mind to imagine reasons for the delay. Twenty-four days ago the gentleman who now presented the report, announced to the House his conviction that all the time which our political existence would allow should be given to the person accused for the purpose of making his defence; and he moved a recommitment of the report of the last session for the purpose of alteration or amendment. A solution of the difficulties which have occupied my mind upon this subject, said Mr. E., may perhaps be found in the report itself. If I understand it, it embraces accusations, the evidence of which repose in the breasts of the committee alone, as it has never been exhibited to the House. This course of proceeding may be parliamentary and proper, but it strikes my mind as possessing a very different character. At the last session a voluminous body of evidence was reported, upon which the House decided the general question of impeachment. The committee appointed to prepare and report articles of impeachment possess not the powers of a committee of inquiry; the inquiry is already at an end; they are only to reduce to form the decision of the House upon the evidence before them; and if they have proceeded to make a new inquiry, to obtain new evidence, and report new articles thereon, they have wandered beyond the limits of their duty. Nor am I furnished with that intuitive knowledge of right and wrong, in cases of this kind, which would be necessary to enable me to decide almost instantly upon a question of such magnitude. While it is our duty to grant a reasonable time to the person accused to make his defence, it is indispensably necessary to proceed not only with deliberation but with caution. He concluded by moving that the report be made the order for Thursday next.

The question was taken on Thursday, as the most distant day, and lost; 40 voting for and 68 against it. Wednesday was next tried and lost. It was then ordered for Monday, and in the mean time to be printed.

On motion, the House adjourned.

MONDAY, December 3.

An engrossed bill repealing so much of the act, entitled "An act for laying and collecting duties on imports and tonnage within the territory ceded to the United States by the treaty of the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States and the French Republic, and for other purposes," as prohibits drawbacks of duties upon goods in certain cases, was read the third time.

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, and that the title be, "An act concerning drawbacks on goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from the district of Orleans."

Mr. RODNEY, from the committee appointed, presented a bill establishing a court for adjudication of prizes in certain cases; which was twice read and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH, after the minutes of Friday were read, said he perceived that certain persons having claims against the United States, had obtained an order of the House for a reference of their claims to a select committee. He was not then in the House, and not being acquainted with the petitioners, and not knowing who were on the committee, the motion he was about to make could not be attributed to personal motives, but to a respect for regularity in the proceedings of the House; he wished when the House had standing committees the members of which, from frequent investigation, were more minutely acquainted with the detail than others, that all subjects relative thereto should be sent before them rather than to select committees. For these considerations he moved to refer the petition, memorial, or remonstrance, or whatever it was denominated, from certain agents of Yazoo claimants to the Committee of Claims, and that the committee erected for inquiring therein be discharged.

Mr. NICHOLSON, informing Mr. J. RANDOLPH that another petition on the same subject had been referred the preceding day to the same Committee, asked if the gentleman had not better include both in his motion.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH incorporated the suggestion of Mr. N., in his motion. And on the question there was 56 yeas, and 27 nays—of course all controversies relating to the Yazoo claims go to that committee.

Mr. NICHOLSON presented a memorial from the inhabitants of Louisiana, said to be signed by 2,000 heads of families, which takes a view of the laws of the United States, for their Territorial government. He observed that the three gentlemen appointed from that country had requested him to state that the copy which appeared in our papers in the course of the last statement was by no means authentic, many expressions as well as ideas in that do not appear in this, and there are expressions and ideas used in this, that are not to be found in that. The translation that accompanies the French original, though correct, may contain expressions that the House will have to pardon, ascribing them to the feelings of the inhabitants so peculiarly situated, and not to any want of respect for the Government of the Union; they labored under an idea that their morals, manners, and customs, had been misunderstood, and consequently complained of, and that the law of last session was passed by Congress under those mistaken impressions. They, therefore, pray an alteration of the law so far as to allow them to be their own legislators, not dividing the Territory into two governments, and not prohibiting the importation of slaves.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved, after the memorial was read, to refer it to the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message which relates to the melioration of the government of Louisiana, and it was referred accordingly.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE CHASE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee of the thirtieth ultimo, to whom was referred the report of a select committee appointed on the thirteenth of March last, "to prepare and report articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States."

The report was read, as follows:

The committee to whom was referred, on the sixth instant, the report of a select committee, appointed on the thirteenth of March last, "to prepare and report articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States," submit to the House the following report:

Articles exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, in maintenance, and support of their impeachment against him, for high crimes and misdemeanors.

ART. 1. That, unmindful of the solemn duties of his office, and contrary to the sacred obligation by which he stood bound to discharge them, "faithfully and impartially, and without respect to persons," the said Samuel Chase, on the trial of John Fries, charged with treason, before the circuit court of the United States, held for the district of Pennsylvania, in the city of Philadelphia, during the months of April and May, one thousand eight hundred, whereat the said Samuel Chase presided, did, in his judicial capacity, conduct himself in a manner highly arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust, viz:

1. In delivering an opinion in writing, on the question of law, on the construction of which the defence of the accused materially depended, tending to prejudice the minds of the jury against the case of the said John Fries, the prisoner, before counsel had been heard in his defence:

2. In restricting the counsel for the said Fries from recurring to such English authorities as they believed apposite, or from citing certain statutes of the United States, which they deemed illustrative of the positions upon which they intended to rest the defence of their client:

3. In debarring the prisoner from his Constitutional privilege of addressing the jury (through his counsel) on the law, as well as on the fact, which was to determine his guilt, or innocence, and at the same time endeavoring to wrest from the jury their indisputable right to hear argument, and determine upon the question of law, as well as the question of fact, involved in the verdict which they were required to give.

In consequence of which irregular conduct of the said Samuel Chase, as dangerous to our liberties as it is novel to our laws and usages, the said John Fries was deprived of the right, secured to him by the eighth article amendatory of the Constitution, and was condemned to death without having been heard by counsel, in his defence; to the disgrace of the character of the American Bench, in manifest violation of law and justice, and in open contempt of the right of juries, on which, ultimately, rest the liberty and safety of the American people.

ART. 2. That, prompted by a similar spirit of persecution and injustice, at a circuit court of the United States, held at Richmond, in the month of May, 1800, for the district of Virginia; whereat the said Samuel Chase presided, and before which a certain James Thompson Callender was arraigned for a libel on John Adams, then President of the United States, the said Samuel Chase, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the said Callender, did overrule the objection of John Basset, one of the jury, who wished to be excused from serving on the trial, because he had made up his mind as to the publication from which the words, charged to be libellous, in the indictment, were extracted; and the said Basset was accordingly sworn, and did serve on the said jury, by whose verdict the prisoner was subsequently convicted.

ART. 3. That with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the prisoner, the evidence of John Taylor, a material witness on behalf of the aforesaid Callender, was not permitted by the said Samuel Chase to be given in, on pretence that the said witness could not prove the truth of the whole of one of the charges contained in the indictment, although the said charge embraced more than one fact.

ART. 4. That the conduct of the said Samuel Chase was marked, during the whole course of the said trial, by manifest injustice, partiality, and intemperance, viz:

1. In compelling the prisoner's counsel to reduce to writing, and submit to the inspection of the court, for their admission or rejection, all questions which the said counsel meant to propound to the above named John Taylor, the witness.

2. In refusing to postpone the trial, although an affidavit was regularly filed, stating the absence of material witnesses on behalf of the accused; and although it was manifest, that, with the utmost diligence, the attendance of such witnesses could not have been procured at that term.

3. In the use of unusual, rude, and contemptuous expressions towards the prisoner's counsel; and in falsely insinuating that they wished to excite the public fears and indignation, and to produce that insubordination to law to which the conduct of the judge did at the same time manifestly tend.

4. In repeated and vexatious interruptions of the said counsel, on the part of the said judge, which at length induced them to abandon their cause and their client, who was thereupon convicted and condemned to fine and imprisonment.

5. In an indecent solicitude, manifested by the said Samuel Chase, for the conviction of the accused, unbecoming even a public prosecutor, but highly disgraceful to the character of a judge, as it was subversive of justice.

ART. 5. And whereas it is provided by the act of Congress passed on the 24th day of September, 1786, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," that for any crime, or offence, against the United States, the offender may be arrested, imprisoned, or bailed; agreeably to the usual mode of process in the State where such offender may be found; and whereas it is provided by the laws of Virginia, that upon presentment by any grand jury of an offence not capital, the court shall order the clerk to issue a summons against the person or persons offending, to appear and answer such presentment at the next court; yet, the said Samuel Chase did, at the court aforesaid, award a capias against the body of the said James Thompson Callender, indicted for an offence not capital, whereupon the said Callender was arrested and committed to close custody, contrary to law in that case made and provided.

ART. 6. And whereas it is provided by the 34th section of the aforesaid act, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," that the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as the rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply; and whereas by the laws of Virginia it is provided, that in cases not capital, the offender shall not be held to answer any presentment of a grand jury until the court next succeeding that during which such presentment shall have been made, yet the said Samuel Chase, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the said James Thompson Callender, did, at the court aforesaid, rule and adjudge the said Callender to trial during the term at which he, the said Callender, was presented and indicted, contrary to law in that case made and provided.

ART. 7. That, at a circuit court of the United States, for the district of Delaware, held at Newcastle, in the month of June, one thousand eight hundred, whereat the said Samuel Chase presided, the said Samuel Chase, disregarding the duties of his office, did descend from the dignity of a judge, and stoop to the level of an informer, by refusing to discharge the grand jury, although entreated by several of the said jury so to do; and after the said grand jury had regularly declared through their foreman, that they had found no bills of indictment, nor had any presentments to make, by observing to the said grand jury, that he, the said Samuel Chase, understood "that a highly seditious temper had manifested itself in the State of Delaware, among a certain class of people, particularly in Newcastle county, and more especially in the town of Wilmington, where lived a most seditious printer, unrestrained by any principle of virtue, and regardless of social order, that the name of this printer was"—but checking himself, as if sensible of the indecorum which he was committing, added "that it might be assuming too much to mention the name of this person, but it becomes your duty, gentlemen, to inquire diligently into this matter," or words to that effect: and that with intention to procure the prosecution of the printer in question, the said Samuel Chase did, moreover, authoritatively enjoin on the District Attorney of the United States the necessity of procuring a file of the papers to which he alluded, (and which were understood to be those published under the title of "Mirror of the Times and General Advertiser,") and, by a strict examination of them, to find some passage which might furnish the groundwork of a prosecution against the printer of the said paper: thereby degrading his high judicial functions, and tending to impair the public confidence in, and respect for the tribunals of justice, so essential to the general welfare.

ART. 8. And whereas mutual respect and confidence between the Government of the United States and those of the individual States; and between the people and those governments; respectively, are highly conducive to that public harmony without which there can be no public happiness, yet the said Samuel Chase, disregarding the duties and dignity of his judicial character, did, at a circuit court for the District of Maryland, held at Baltimore, in the month of May, one thousand eight hundred and three, pervert his official right and duty to address the grand jury then and there assembled, on the matters coming within the province of the said jury, for the purpose of delivering to the said jury an intemperate and inflammatory political harangue, with intent to excite the fears and resentment of the said grand jury and of the good people of Maryland against their State government and constitution, a conduct highly censurable in any, but peculiarly indecent and unbecoming in a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States; and moreover that the said Samuel Chase, then and there, under pretence of exercising his judicial right to address the said grand jury, as aforesaid, did, in a manner highly unwarrantable, endeavor to excite the odium of the said grand jury, and of the good people of Maryland, against the Government of the United States, by delivering opinions, which, even if the judicial authority were competent to their expression, on a suitable occasion and in a proper manner, were at the time, and as delivered by him, highly indecent, extra judicial, and tending to prostitute the high judicial character with which he was invested to the low purpose of an electioneering partisan.

And the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any farther articles, or other accusation, or impeachment, against the said Samuel Chase, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the said articles, or any of them, and of offering proof to all and every the aforesaid articles, and to all and every other articles, impeachment, or accusation, which shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall require, do demand that the said Samuel Chase may be put to answer the said crimes and misdemeanors, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments, may be thereupon had and given, as are agreeable to law and justice.

MR. ELLIOT.—It will be recollected, Mr. Chairman, by every member of the Committee who was present at the close of the last session, that upon the report of the committee of inquiry, recommending the impeachment of Judge Chase, no member but myself thought proper to deliver his sentiments. I feel no inclination to retravel the ground which I then occupied in solitude; especially as the opinions which I then advanced remain unaltered. Nor have I a disposition to embarrass the proceedings. I wish, indeed, to simplify them. But I feel it my duty to suggest that course of proceeding, and that mode of decision, which I believe to be demanded equally by our duty to the person accused, to our own consciences, and to our country; and I shall suggest them with confidence rather than with diffidence, because they are so extremely obvious. I believe it to be our duty deliberately to investigate the principles involved in the report, some of which are certainly novel, and to take distinct questions upon each general head of accusation. Because I think Mr. Chase ought to be impeached for two or three misdemeanors, I cannot give my vote in favor of articles accusing him of eight high crimes and thirty or forty misdemeanors. If I should be so fortunate as to be seconded in the opinions which I entertain upon this subject, I will move to amend the report upon the table by striking out that part which relates to the conduct of Judge Chase on the trial of John Fries, and which is now comprised in the first article.

The motion being seconded,

MR. SMILIE asked if the motion was in order; observing that the report consisted of a number of distinct propositions which he conceived were to be considered in the usual way, article by article, and the question would be, either to concur or non-concur. The gentleman (Mr. E.) might gratify his zeal in this way as well as in the mode he had proposed for striking out, and the result would be the same. It would furnish an opportunity for every member to speak for or against each article, as well as to amend any.

MR. ELLIOT replied that he was not tenacious of form. His only object was to obtain distinct questions. If the Committee of the Whole were disposed to pursue the course pointed out by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he would withdraw his motion.

THE CHAIRMAN gave it as his opinion that the proper mode of proceeding would be to take the report up by articles.

On the first article being read, MR. ELLIOT moved to strike it out.

THE CHAIRMAN said the motion to strike out the first section was in order, and was usual in the case of a bill, in order to decide upon its merits; but in independent articles like the present it would be preferable to take the question on concurring, so that the opinion of the committee might be ascertained on each article.

MR. SMILIE expressed an indifference as to the mode of decision, but he believed what he had suggested was conformable to all former rules and practices.

MR. J. RANDOLPH, after a short pause, said that the question of concurrence with the select committee, in his opinion, ought to be taken on each article, separately; and for his part he had no objection to take it upon each separate member of each article, if any gentleman wished it to be taken in that way.

MR. NICHOLSON, observing that there was no question before the committee, conceived that one ought to be presented for their decision. He therefore moved that the Committee of the Whole concur with the select committee and agree to the first article. Which being seconded, the question was put by the Chairman; a division was called for, and 78 members rising in the affirmative, it was carried without reverting to the question—78 being more than a majority of the whole House had all the members been present.

The second article being under consideration—

DECEMBER, 1804.

Official Conduct of Judge Chase.

H. OF R.

Mr. DAWSON.—This mode of proceeding incurs some difficulty which might be prevented by the motion to strike out, as in the latter case the principle upon which the article is grounded would be tested, and if the principle was adopted the phraseology might be varied and amended as might be thought proper.

The CHAIRMAN.—The Committee has already determined to proceed in a different manner; it therefore does not rest upon the discretion of the Chair.

Mr. SMILIE suggested the propriety of reading the evidence in support of each article, as there were many gentlemen here who were not present at the last session when the testimony was both read and printed.

Mr. FINDLEY seconded the motion.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—Reading the testimony will occupy the whole day, it constitutes the volume in my hand (a volume of apparently two hundred pages.)

Mr. SMILIE would not call for its reading on his own account; he had already pursued the testimony, but there were several gentlemen now present who were not here at the last session, who perhaps have not had an opportunity of seeing the documents, and he believed gentlemen generally voted with more satisfaction on subjects with which they are well acquainted than on those where doubts or apprehensions are entertained. Besides, he deemed it more safe and dignified to proceed with caution and due deliberation on so serious a question as that of impeaching a person holding one of the most important stations in the Government.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—The manner of proceeding in the business of impeachment at the last session, was, to read such parts of the testimony upon the call of a member as related to the particular article under consideration. He recollected, upon the impeachment of Judge Pickens, that the gentleman on the other side of the House from New Hampshire called for reading the particular part of the testimony most likely to extricate the officer impeached, or produce a conviction in the minds of others such as he felt himself—he hoped the same course of proceeding would be adopted by the Committee, and such portions would from time to time be read as members required.

The CHAIRMAN put the question on reading the testimony generally, which was lost on the division, being only 40 in the affirmative, and 50 in the negative.

The second article being under consideration, Mr. BOYLE moved to amend the latter part of the article by striking out the words in italics and inserting those in a parenthesis: "John Basset, one of the jury, who wished to be excused from serving on the said trial, because he had made up his mind as to (that) the publication from which the words charged to be libellous in the indictment were extracted (was within the statute of the United States upon which the said Callender was indicted) &c." Making the allegation, in this way, you will find it supported by the testimony, for they are the words of the testimony itself. It is said that the eighth juror acknowledged that he had formed an unequivocal opinion that such a book as "The Prospect Before Us" came within the sedition law.

A member supposed that the rule adopted by the Committee, against the reading of the general testimony would not prevent particular parts, as they apply to particular points, from being read. He therefore called for the reading so much of the evidence as related to the juror mentioned in the second article.

Mr. NICHOLSON mentioned page 133 of the depositions of the witnesses on the part of the United States, as the place where the Clerk would find what the gentleman wanted.

Which being read as follows:

"Perhaps it is not improper here to observe, that the eighth juror answered, when the previous question was put to him, that though he had never read or heard the charges in the indictment, and knew not what the traverser had published, yet he had formed an unequivocal opinion, that such a book as "The Prospect Before Us" was, came within the sedition law: but no objection was made to him, and he was sworn like the rest."

Mr. J. RANDOLPH referred to page 56, near the top, for other corroborative evidence.

The Clerk read the following:

"One of the jury, John Basset stated that he was unwilling to serve, having made up his mind as to the book called "The Prospect Before Us;" but as he acknowledged that he had not formed and delivered an opinion concerning the charges in the indictment, because, in fact, he knew not what they were, his objection was overruled."

And also from page 61, as follows:

"It is to be observed that Mr. Basset, who had been summoned on the jury, seemed to have considerable scruples at serving, and stated that he had expressed some opinion as to "The Prospect Before Us." Judge Chase, however, declared Mr. Basset a good juror, and he was sworn and acted as a juror."

Mr. J. RANDOLPH thanked his friend from Kentucky for every suggestion tending to improve the report of the committee, confident that his motives were highly commendable. The report has been referred by the House to a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of obtaining by a full, fair, and free discussion, two objects—first, to determine whether the charges exhibited are such as the House are willing to prefer against the person impeached; and in order, if they be found incorrect, to make them as perfect as possible. On both these points I invite discussion in the name of the select committee, who brought in this report. At the same time I wish to suggest to my friend (Mr. BOYLE) the propriety of re-examining his idea, and ascertaining whether the eighth juror alluded to in the account of Callender's trial is the juror mentioned in the testimony of Mr. Hay and of Mr. Nicholas. These gentlemen mention the juror by name. Mr. Robertson, in his account of the trial, mentioned him by number. Now, if it should appear that the eighth juror was not Mr. Basset, must not the article fall to the ground if the proposed alteration should take place? I think it one of the strongest circumstances in this article, that a juror was compelled to serve after stating that he had made up his mind as to the criminal offence on the question he was about being sworn well and truly to try. The committee will perceive a considerable variation between the testimony in pages 133 and 56. In the first the writer introduces with a "perhaps it is not improper here to observe," that the eighth juror answered when the previous question was put to him, though he had never read the indictment, yet he had formed an opinion that such a book as "The Prospect Before Us" came within the sedition law. This I believe is the amount of what is said in that page, and it appears from this to be an incidental circumstance only; whereas if you turn to page 56, it is there stated, with the clearest precision, that he was unwilling to serve, because he had made up his mind on the book called "The Prospect Before Us." It does not appear to be drawn from him by the previous question, but it does appear fully and unequivocally to be of his own mere motion, a conscientious scruple to try what he had already passed judgment upon. In my opinion the report is better as it stands than it would be with the alteration, and I submit to my friend from Kentucky (Mr. BOYLE) whether it would not be better to let the article stand, rather than fail before the Senate, if it should turn out that the eighth juror and Mr. Basset are different persons.

Mr. BOYLE had heard no objection but which might be obviated by another amendment; that was, to strike out the name of John Basset, and then it would apply to the jurymen who had used the expression; in that case the House might rely in sustaining their impeachment before the Senate upon the evidence as well of page 133 as on that of 56. He moved to strike out "John Basset."

Mr. NICHOLSON did not think it necessary that the words proposed to be stricken out should be struck out. He thought that under the words contained in this article as it stood it would be perfectly regular and proper, even on a trial proceeding before the Senate, to give in evidence the testimony alluded to in page 133. And he had no doubt but the Senate would admit all evidence of this kind to have its proper weight, because it seems to be universally admitted, and has been long understood, that in proceedings by way of impeachment, that technical precision is not required, which is required by our courts of law on indictment. If, however, gentlemen are embarrassed about having this testimony directly pointed, this may be easily come at. They can add it to the article as another count is added to a bill of indictment. This mode is very well known, and may be adopted by those who think it necessary; for his part he did not think it necessary.

Mr. BOYLE withdrew his motion for the present.

The question was now taken on the second article and carried—eighty members rising in the affirmative.

The third article was then taken up by the Committee.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH read the following testimony in support of this article, viz:

"When the trial commenced, Col. John Taylor, of Caroline, was introduced as a witness for the prisoner. I believe he was sworn. The counsel wished to interrogate him. This they were not permitted to do until they had stated the points to which his evidence related. They were then obliged by Mr. Chase to reduce the questions which they wished to propound to Col. Taylor, to writing, and then to submit them to his inspection, that he might determine whether they should be propounded or not."

"Col. Taylor's evidence was rejected.

"The ground of this opinion as stated by Mr. Chase was this, that Col. Taylor could not prove the whole of one charge. The charge was, the judge (Chase) said, 'that the President was a professed aristocrat; that he had proved faithful and serviceable to the British interest.' Proving half, he said, was doing nothing; both facts must be proved. It was contended, on the part of the prisoner, that if it was necessary to prove both facts by the same witness, the charge in both points would be proved by the testimony of Col. Taylor. He would prove that Mr. Adams had professed aristocratic opinions, and that he had proved faithful and serviceable to the British interest, in the way meant by 'The Prospect Before Us,' by voting against the sequestration law, and the law suspending all intercourse with Great Britain. The judge (Chase) repeated that the evidence was inadmissible, that the counsel knew it to be so, and that they only wanted to deceive and to mislead the populace."

And afterwards he added the following, viz:

"Interrogatory 4th.—Did Mr. Chase refuse to the prisoner the testimony of a witness, because he, the said witness, could not prove the truth of all the facts set forth, and upon which the indictment was grounded?"

"Answer. After the jury in Callender's case were sworn, Colonel Taylor, of Caroline, who attended as a witness, in consequence of a subpoena served upon him on behalf of Callender, was called to the book and sworn in the usual form. Judge Chase at this moment asked, with considerable haste and eagerness of manner, what the counsel expected to prove by the witness? He was informed that they meant to ask him whether Mr. Adams had not avowed, in his presence, sentiments inimical to a Republican form of Government, and whether he did not, whilst Vice President, give the casting vote in the Senate against the sequestration of British debts, and against the suspension of intercourse with Great Britain. Judge Chase demanded that the counsel should state in writing the questions meant to be asked. The counsel for the defendant opposed this, because, although a number of witnesses had been examined on the part of the United States, no similar requisition had been made with respect to them, because it was contrary to the practice in the State courts, and because, also, it was unreasonable in itself, and calculated to subject every question of fact to the control of the court. Judge Chase, however, insisted that the questions should be submitted to his previous decision. They were accordingly put in writing, and were as follows, to wit:

"1. Did you ever hear Mr. Adams express any sentiments favorable to monarchy or aristocracy; and what were they?"

"2. Did you ever hear Mr. Adams, while Vice President, express his disapprobation of the funding system?"

"3. Do you know whether Mr. Adams did, in the year 1794, vote against the sequestration of British debts, and for stopping all intercourse with Great Britain?"

"After having examined the questions, Judge Chase declared that Colonel Taylor's evidence was inadmissible. He declared that no evidence could be received that did not justify the whole charge. The charge, said he, is, that the traverser said of the President, he is a professed aristocrat, and has proved faithful to the British interest; now you must prove both points, or you prove nothing; and as your evidence relates to one only, it cannot be received—you must prove all or none. This was in substance, and it is believed the precise words in which Judge Chase stated his objection to Colonel Taylor's evidence. The counsel asked the judge whether they could not be allowed to prove part of a charge by one witness and part by another? To this Judge Chase replied, that if the counsel could prove the whole of any one charge by Colonel Taylor, they might do it, otherwise they should not examine him. The counsel contended that Colonel Taylor's evidence applied to the whole of the charge which the judge had stated in his opinion. That they meant to prove by him that the President has professed anti-republican sentiments, and had proved faithful and serviceable to the British interest, in the sense in which those expressions were used in the Prospect. The judge, however, adhered to his determination to exclude the evidence; and Colonel Taylor retired from the court with evident marks of astonishment."

The question was taken upon the third article without a division, and carried.

The fourth article being before the Committee, it was considered by paragraphs.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—The testimony in support of the first paragraph has been read on the preceding article; in it is that part of Mr. Nicholas's testimony stating the demand of Judge Chase that the counsel should state in writing the questions meant to be asked.

The CHAIRMAN proceeded to read the second paragraph, and

Mr. J. RANDOLPH read in its support the following affidavit:

CITY OF RICHMOND, to wit:

This day James Thompson Callender made oath before me, a magistrate for the said city, that William Gardner, Tench Coxe, Judge Bee, Timothy Pickering, William B. Giles, Stevens Thomson Mason, and General Blackburn, he believes to be material witnesses in his defence, against an indictment found against him during the present term of the circuit court of the United States for the middle circuit, Virginia district: that William Gardner, aforesaid, resides, he believes, in Portsmouth, in the State of New Hampshire; that Tench Coxe, aforesaid, resides in Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania; that Judge Bee resides, the deponent hath understood, in South Carolina, but in what part of the State he knows not; that Timothy Pickering, aforesaid, resided of late in Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, but where he resides at this time the deponent doth not know; that William B. Giles, aforesaid, he hath understood, since he hath been furnished with a copy of the indictment, and since the said Giles hath left town, resides in the county of Amelia; and that General Blackburn resides in the county of Bath.

8th CON. 2d SES.—24

The said James Thompson Callender further declares, that he expects to prove by the said William Gardner, and that he verily believes that he shall prove by the said William Gardner, that the said William Gardner was commissioner of loans for the State of New Hampshire, under the Government of the United States, and that he was turned out of the said office of commissioner of loans, because he, the said Gardner, refused to subscribe an address circulated in the town of Portsmouth in New Hampshire, and presented to the President of the United States, in the year 1798, at the instance of several inhabitants of the said town; in which address unequivocal approbation of the conduct of the said President in the administration of the United States is expressed.

Second. The said James Thompson Callender also declares on oath, that he verily believes that he shall prove by the evidence of Tench Coxe, aforesaid, that he, the said Tench Coxe, in the year 1798, held an important office under the Government of the United States, to wit, commissioner of the revenue, from which office the said Coxe was ejected by the President of the United States; because he did not approve the measures of his, the said President's Administration, or the principles on which it was conducted.

That he verily believes he shall be able to prove by the evidence of Judge Bee, that he did receive from the President of the United States in the year 1779, a letter in which he, the said President, did advise and request the said Judge Bee, then acting in his judicial character, to deliver to the Consul of the British nation in Charleston, Jonathan Robbins, alias Thomas Nash, who had been apprehended and carried before the said judge on a charge of murder committed on the high seas on board the British frigate Hermione.

He farther deposes on oath, that he verily believes that he shall be able to prove, by the evidence of Timothy Pickering, that the President of the United States was in possession of despatches from Mr. Vans Murray, American Minister in Holland, containing assurances on the part of the French Republic, that ambassadors from the United States would be received in a way satisfactory to the people and Government of the United States, many weeks while Congress was in session, before he communicated the same to Congress.

The deponent further saith, that he verily believes that he shall be able to prove, by the evidence of Stevens Thomson Mason and William B. Giles, that John Adams, President of the United States, has unequivocally avowed, in conversation with them, principles utterly incompatible with the principles of the present Constitution of the United States; principles which could not be carried into operation under any political institution without the establishment of a direct, powerful, and dangerous aristocracy: that he declared, in express terms, to the said Stevens Thomson Mason, that he had no more idea that the present federal Constitution could, for any length of time, control the people of the United States, than that it could control the motions of the planets; that he also declared to the said Stevens Thomson Mason, that he had no more idea that political society could exist without a distinction of ranks, than that an army could exist without officers. And also, that he can prove by the said William B. Giles, that the President of the United States has avowed, in conversation with him, a sentiment to this effect: that he thought the Executive Department of the United States ought to be vested with power to direct and control the public will.

That this deponent verily believes that he shall be able to prove by General Blackburn that he did, on the — day of —, in the year 1798, receive an address from John Adams, President of the United States, in answer to the field officers of Bath county, in which the said President does avow, that there was a party in Virginia which deserved to be humbled into dust and ashes, before the indignant frowns of their injured, insulted, and offended country.

And this deponent further saith, that he is advised and believes that it is material to his defence against the indictment aforesaid, that he should procure authentic copies of sundry answers made by the President of the United States to addresses from the inhabitants of the United States in various parts thereof, which authentic copies he cannot procure, so as to be in readiness for trial, during the present term.

He also saith, that he is advised and doth believe that a certain book entitled "An Essay on Canon and Feudal Law," or entitled in words to that import, ascribed to the President of the United States, and of which he believes the President is the author, is material to his defence, and that he cannot procure a copy of the same, and evidence to prove that the said President is the author thereof, without being allowed several weeks and perhaps months for the purpose.

He farther saith, that he is told by the counsel who mean to appear for him, that they cannot possibly be prepared to investigate the evidence relating to the several charges in the indictment, even if all the persons and documents wanted were upon the spot.

May 28th, 1800.

WM. DUVAL.

District of Virginia, 5th Circuit, to wit.

I certify that the foregoing is truly copied from the original in my office.

W. MARSHALL, Clerk.

The Committee proceeded to consider the third paragraph of the 4th article.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—Under another paragraph, part of the testimony has been read, but the following should be added. Mr. HAY says:

"The counsel, who were associated with me in Callender's defence, attempted to address the jury on the unconstitutionality of the law on which the indictment was founded. They were interrupted, and obliged, by Mr. Chase, if not ordered, to sit down. I then addressed Mr. Chase himself, with a view to satisfy him, that I had a right to discuss this point before the jury. I told him that what I was then about to say, was intended for the court alone. He interrupted me; he asked some question which was answered; in a very short time, after I had resumed my argument, I was interrupted again by Mr. Chase. How often I was interrupted I know not; but I was interrupted, rudely interrupted, several times. Having seen in the course of this trial what I had never seen before, having felt what I never felt before, and what I certainly expect never to feel again, and being impressed with a belief that Mr. Chase was determined to silence me, if he could, my mind was overwhelmed by conflicting sentiments, and I quitted the bar, my client, and the court."

When the question was about to be put on agreeing to the whole of the 4th article—

Mr. MOTT rose and remarked that he was not here when the committee on this subject reported at the last session, and of course did not get a copy of the evidence; he had however seen a part thereof in the newspapers and examined so much of the subject as to have satisfied him, that it was proper to vote in favor of two of the articles, to wit, the first and third; but as he had not an opportunity since coming to this place of comparing the articles of impeachment with the testimony on which they were founded, and since he could not make up his mind in hearing the evidence partially read, and as the House have refused to put it off for a short time, and he was not allowed to make the examination for himself, he was obliged to inform the committee, that he was not satisfied to vote in favor of the 4th article, whereas had he been allowed time he might join in a vote with the majority.

Mr. NICHOLSON said all the evidence on the subject of this article had not been read, he would therefor read it himself, as the Clerk was indisposed with a hoarseness.—He read the following:

The additional deposition of Philip Norborne Nicholas, taken before George Wythe, and Joseph Scott, Esquires, under authority of the House of Representatives of the United States.

"The said Nicholas, being asked by the said Commissioners what was the general deportment and manner of Judge Chase during the trial of James Thompson Callender, answered:

"That the general deportment and manner of Mr. Chase, during the said trial, appeared to the said Nicholas to be marked with great violence and precipitation; and that Judge Chase manifested a solicitude for the conviction of the prisoner, which, in the estimation of said Nicholas was improper in a judge sitting in a criminal prosecution. The said Nicholas further states, that the deportment of Judge Chase to the counsel who appeared for Callender was rude and overbearing, and calculated to prevent that full and free defence, without which it was impossible for them to do justice to their client.

PHILIP N. NICHOLAS.

"RICHMOND, February 7, 1804."

"The additional deposition of George Hay, who, being asked what were the manners and deportment of Samuel Chase during the trial of James Thompson Callender? deposed and saith:

"That it appeared to him at the time of the trial, and he yet believes, that the manners of Mr. Chase were intentionally rude and insolent. The deponent thought, and still thinks, that Mr. Chase was determined that Callender should, if possible, be convicted, and that to accomplish this purpose, he endeavored to intimidate, to depress, and to silence his counsel. He interrupted them frequently with wanton rudeness. He ordered one, if not more, of them to sit down. He charged them with advancing doctrines which they knew to be illegal, and which they advanced, he said, only to deceive and mislead the populace. The patience of the deponent was at length exhausted, and he quitted the court and the cause, under a belief that further exertions in the defence would only tend to cover himself with still greater shame, to subject him to still greater humiliation.

"The deponent believes that there did not escape from him, during the trial, a word or gesture that could have given offence to the judge. The conduct of his associates was, he believes, equally guarded. He does not, therefore, ascribe the insolence of Mr. Chase to irritation occasioned by the conduct of the bar.

The deponent is under no apprehension that his judgment has been much misled by the circumstances attending his own situation. He knows, and can now name men, whose politics then differed from his own, who expressed their abhorrence of Mr. Chase's conduct, in terms as strong as language could afford. In fact, the public mind was very much excited, and apprehensions were entertained by many, that some serious disturbance might take place. Mr. Monroe, then Governor of Virginia, was so completely convinced of the danger, that he not only earnestly recommended moderation and forbearance to those who were daily crowding about him, but kept his eye constantly on the capitol, that he might be ready to command the peace, at the first appearance of commotion. To him Mr. Chase is probably indebted for the safety of his person during his residence in Richmond.

"The solicitude of Mr. Monroe to preserve order, arose from causes totally unconnected with Mr. Chase. The character of the State, he observed, had never been tarnished by any opposition to the laws, or any outrage on persons clothed with its authority. The preservation of this character at that period, (May, 1800,) was, in his estimation, a matter of infinite importance. He therefore urged and entreated those who he supposed might come into collision with the judge, to be patient under every outrage."

"GEORGE HAY.

"RICHMOND, Feb. 7, 1804."

The question was taken on the fourth article, and carried without a division.

The fifth article was then taken into consideration.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, stated the circumstances upon which this article was grounded. By the thirty-third section of the act of Congress establishing the judicial courts of the United States, it is provided that, for any crime or offence against the United States the offender shall be arrested, imprisoned, or bailed, agreeably to the usual mode of process in the State where such offender may be found; and it is provided by the laws of Virginia, printed in a volume called "The Revised Code of 1794," that the manner of proceeding against persons charged with crimes shall be in one of these two modes; the first, in capital cases, such as treason or felony; the second, in cases not capital. The Virginia laws authorize expressly the issuing of a capias, on which, the body of an offender may be taken and committed to close custody in the first species of offence. In the other case, that is, of offences not capital, this process is not warranted by our laws, which require a different process, viz: a summons, which the court may order the clerk to issue, returnable to the next ensuing court. In the case of Callender, who was presented and indicted for a crime not capital, the circuit court did issue the process which is only warranted in capital cases. To convince the Committee on these points, he read the fifth section of the law of Virginia, page 110, respecting the trial and punishment of crimes, and also section twenty-eighth, page 112. From these regulations, he said, there could not remain a shadow of doubt that the process which was issued against Callender by order of the circuit court, and which is annexed to the articles of impeachment, and which commands the marshal of the Virginia district to arrest the body of J. T. Callender, and bring him forthwith before the judges of the court, was illegal, being contrary to the laws of Virginia, and of course contrary to the laws of the United States.

The question was taken on adopting the fifth article, and carried—71 voting in the affirmative, and 30 in the negative.

The sixth article being under consideration,

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said, the law of Virginia relative to this point having just been read, he would only point to the words which are repeated from that law by the article of impeachment. They evince that the authority of Congress as well as the laws of the State of Virginia, had been both disregarded and contemned.

On the question to agree to the sixth article, the Committee divided, there being 70 in its favor, and 22 against it—it was carried.

The seventh article being before the Committee,

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said it was extracted, almost word for word, from the deposition of George Read, Attorney for Delaware district. The deposition is as follows:

"First. To the first interrogatory this deponent saith, that he was present in the character of District Attorney of the United States of America, in and for Delaware district, at a circuit court of the said United States, holden at Newcastle, on the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth days of June, one thousand eight hundred, in and for the said district, by and before Samuel Chase, one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and Gunning Bedford, district judge of the United States aforesaid, for the said district.

"Second. To the second interrogatory this deponent saith, that he was present in court on the first day of the said court, mentioned in this deponent's answer to the first interrogatory, when the grand jury then and there attending, after having received a charge from the said Samuel Chase as presiding judge, retired to their room, and also when they returned to the bar of the said court.

"Third. To the third interrogatory this deponent saith, that the grand jury, through their foreman, upon being asked by the clerk the question stated in the third interrogatory, did answer that they had found no bills of indictment, nor had any presentments to make.

"Fourth. To the fourth interrogatory this deponent saith, that the said Samuel Chase did, on receiving the answer from the grand jury, mentioned in this deponent's answer to the 'third interrogatory,' observe to that body, in his hearing, 'That he had been informed or heard a highly seditious temper or disposition had been manifested in the State of Delaware, among a certain class of people, particularly in Newcastle county, and more especially in the town of Wilmington, where lived a most seditious printer, unrestrained by any principle of virtue, and regardless of social order. That the name of this printer was' — (Here the learned judge paused a moment, and then observed:) 'Perhaps it might be assuming too much to mention the name of this person, but it becomes your special duty, and you must inquire diligently into this matter.' That although this deponent will not undertake to say that every word as here set forth is precisely what the honorable judge expressed, yet he is perfectly convinced that the language is, for the most part, what was used by the said judge, and the ideas conveyed by him at the time, precisely what the context imports.

"Fifth. To the fifth interrogatory the deponent saith, that several members of the grand jury on the behalf of themselves and their brethren, did, as soon as the said judge had closed the observations, detailed in the answer to the fourth interrogatory, then and there earnestly request the court to dismiss them from further attendance on that duty, mentioning to the court, as a reason for the request, that they were generally farmers, and it being the season of harvest, their personal attention was most requisite on their farms. To which the judge replied: 'that the business to which he had called their attention, was of a most urgent and pressing nature and must be attended to, that he could not, therefore, discharge them until the ensuing day, when further information should be communicated to them on the subject he had referred to,' or words to that effect; but this deponent did not at the time hear the judge say that his detaining the grand jury was for the purpose of examining a file of papers, published by the said printer."

On the question to agree to the seventh article, it was carried without a division.

The eighth article being under consideration,

Mr. MOTT rose to move an amendment, which was to strike out the words, declaring that the House "saved to itself the liberty of exhibiting 'at any time hereafter any further articles, or 'other accusation or impeachment against the 'said Samuel Chase," and further, that part which saved to the House "the right of replying to any such articles of impeachment or accusation which shall be exhibited to them." It seemed to him unfair that the House should reserve such a right to themselves. If there is anything more with which he ought to be charged, it ought to be now brought forward, and the accused should be informed at once how far we mean to go, in order to enable him the better to make his defence.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH hoped the gentleman (Mr. MOTT) would not insist upon his amendment. He believed the article stood very well as it was, but, if it be faulty, it has, however, one thing in its favor, it is fortified by precedent, which is of some importance in cases of this nature. He hoped the gentleman, who was a decided friend of the American people, and of the rights of this House, did not wish to abridge the liberties of the one or the privileges of the other, as they had been granted by the people, and had been received by us from our predecessors. He hoped it was not intended that our powers should be less than those who sat here before us, and yet the amendment would be a tacit avowal that they were wrong in making this reservation in the case of the impeachment of Blount, and that we ourselves were wrong in so doing in the case of Judge Pickering. He trusted the House would not agree to the amendment, if it was persisted in by the gentleman.

Mr. MOTT.—If precedents are wrong, they ought not to be our guides, and if we have such precedents the sooner we establish new ones, on other principles, the better. He thought it cruel, as well as unjust, to bring new articles of impeachment against a man when on his trial; a sudden attack, when a man is unprepared, may defeat the best talents and convict an innocent man. He conceived, if they had a design to bring other articles, they ought to do so at the present time; but, if they had not a design, he would ask, why do you reserve a power you do not mean to exercise? He knew it was the practice to make this reservation, and had seen it in New Jersey, but, for all that, he thought it improper and unjust.

The question on adopting the amendment was taken and lost.

The question was next taken on agreeing to the eighth article, and carried in the affirmative.

There were for it seventy-six members, which are more than a majority of the whole House.

Mr. ELLIOT.—Mr. Chairman, as I have voted in opposition to every one of the articles, and shall of course vote in the negative, when they are considered in the aggregate, it is indispensably necessary that I should make a few observations, in order to rescue myself from the imputation of voting, on this occasion, in a different manner from what I did at the last session, although I am already sufficiently justified to my own conscience.

My cool judgment tells me that were I to vote in favor of the present impeachment, in its present form, I must forfeit, in my own estimation, that political character as a republican, which it has been the study of my life to acquire and preserve, and which has hitherto secured me the confidence of a people as truly republican as ever have existed, in any age or nation. It is upon republican principles that I oppose the report. At the last session, I declared myself in favor of the impeachment, so far only as related to the conduct of Judge Chase upon the trial of James Thompson Callender. I considered the conduct of the judge upon that occasion as amounting to a denial of important Constitutional privileges to Callender—the privileges of compulsory process for witnesses, and trial by an impartial jury of his country—and had the Committee taken that strong ground, I must have given it my support. They have, however, abandoned it; and I am decidedly of opinion, that, if the conduct of the judge did not amount to a violation of the Constitution, it ought to be considered as a mere error in judgment; and for errors of judgment a magistrate is not impeachable.

It is not upon any trifling or minute distinction between form and substance, that I found my objections to the second and third articles, but upon what I consider as strong and solid ground. But to the fourth article there are a variety of objections. After having stated in the second and third articles, everything which it was necessary to state, when the strong ground of the Constitution was abandoned, we are presented with the blackest catalogue of judicial crimes that has ever been invented. This article will forever form a phenomenon in the history of impeachments, and command admiration by its wonderful display of the powers of invention, modification, and embellishment. Never have I been more completely convinced that genius is capable of creating anything whatever—that it possesses even magic powers. We are here presented with a stupendous pyramid of judicial guilt, of which manifest injustice forms the pedestal, and indecent solicitude constitutes the apex. Judge Chase is accused of manifest injustice, partiality, intemperance, rudeness, vexation, solicitude, &c., &c. If this horrid list of the crimes of a judge is to be crowned by solicitude, if solicitude is to swell the list of new transgressions, I must still be permitted to believe that its decency or indecency has very little connexion with the essence of its criminality. Besides, the conduct of the judge was different at different stages of the trial, and were I to consider his supposed solicitude as criminal, I could not consider the report as consistent with truth unless amended so as to read in this manner: "In manifesting, in the early part of the trial, an indecent solicitude, and at its later stages, a very decent solicitude, for the conviction of the prisoner, &c." Solicitude is a mere mental operation. Had the judge displayed an anxiety to save the prisoner, he might, with equal propriety, have been impeached as guilty of sympathy or pity.

Official Conduct of Judge Chase.

I cannot vote for the last article without a violation of my political principles. I do not believe that the expression of political opinion is a crime in a Republican Government. I have repeatedly declared that I consider it improper in a judge to read political lectures from the bench: and I have also had frequent opportunities, both on former and recent occasions, of expressing my conviction that the judicial officers ought not to be punished for declaring their political opinions. We ought not ourselves to practice what we reprobate in others, and it is always desirable to carry our own theories into practice.

With these powerful considerations, others of a different nature have naturally mingled themselves, in my own mind, while reflecting upon this important subject. Is there no danger that the feelings and views of party have, imperceptibly to ourselves, involved themselves with our reflections, and that they will improperly influence our conduct? For myself I am disposed to look upon a member of our highest judicial tribunal, upon whom, with correct motives, such an irresistible torrent of public opinion is precipitated, with a favorable eye. It is our duty to endeavor to realize the ancient idea of the blindness of justice. Let us be blind as it respects the man, blind to his political opinions, but eagle-eyed as it respects his crimes. The pure fountain of justice ought not to be polluted with a single muddy particle of the spirit of party.

I have said enough to explain my sentiments and views upon this subject, and I will not trouble the Committee with a repetition of any of my arguments at the last session.

Mr. NICHOLSON inquired of the Chairman whether it would be in order to move an amendment to any of the articles, now they have been severally agreed to.

Mr. VARNUM (Chairman) said the amendments might be moved in the House on agreeing to the report of the Committee of the Whole or in the Committee by a vote to reconsider.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH thought it of importance that if amendments were necessary they should be brought forward in Committee of the Whole, to give gentlemen an opportunity of fuller discussion. In the House, members were trammelled by the rule permitting them only to speak twice on the same question, but here we are free to discuss and debate at pleasure. If an amendment is wished, he would move to reconsider the first article—and he did move it.

It was carried without opposition.

Mr. NICHOLSON then observed, that part of the misconduct of Judge Chase which was complained of had taken place previous to the trial. He would therefore move to make it read by the insertion of the words in italic "the said Samuel Chase antecedent to and on the trial of John Fries," so as to cover the whole ground.—Carried.

Mr. NICHOLSON proposed a similar amendment to the fourth article:

"That the conduct of the said Samuel Chase was marked during the whole course of the said trial as well as antecedent thereto" "with manifest injustice, partiality and intemperance."

The amendment was lost.

After some desultory conversation it was agreed that the amendment to the first article be altered, by inserting the words in relation thereto, instead of those in italic; and a similar amendment was agreed to in the fourth article.

The Committee of the Whole rose and reported the articles as amended, and then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 4.

Two other members, to wit: ABRAM TRIGG, from Virginia, and MATTHEW LYON, from Kentucky, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

Another new member, to wit: ALEXANDER WILSON, returned to serve in this House as a Representative for the State of Virginia, in the place of ANDREW MOORE, appointed a Senator of the United States, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. CLARK, from the committee appointed, on the twenty-third ultimo, "to inquire into the expediency of extending the time for claimants to lands under the State of Georgia, lying south of the State of Tennessee, to register the evidences of their title with the Secretary of State," made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

Mr. M. CLAY, from the committee to whom was recommended, on the twenty-second ultimo, the bill giving power to stockholders of the Marine Insurance Company of Alexandria to insure against fire, reported an amendatory bill; which was twice read and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Mr. CROWNSHIELD, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom were referred the petition of Thomas Parker and others,

Directors of the Library Company of Philadelphia, and the memorial and petition of the Board of Trustees of the College of New Jersey, made the following report:

"The Directors of the Library Company of Philadelphia state to the House that they have lately received a valuable collection of books and prints, bequeathed to their institution, by the Rev. Samuel Preston, of the county of Kent in Great Britain, on the importation of which, at Philadelphia, the sum of four hundred and ninety eight dollars and twenty cents is demanded for duties, agreeably to the laws of the United States.

"The President of the Board of Trustees of New Jersey College informs Congress, that, after replenishing their library, (which had been destroyed by fire) in part, by donations and purchases of books, they have been obliged to import a large number of books from Europe, on the importation of which duties have been bonded at New York, under the laws of Congress, to the amount of four hundred and fifteen dollars and sixty-two cents. The object of the petitioners, in both instances, is to be exonerated from the payment of the duties, on their respective importations, and they pray that the bonds given at the custom house may be cancelled.

"It is not within the knowledge of the committee that any duties which have accrued upon any importation whatever have been restored to the importers. To grant exemptions from duty to any institution, or to free any class or body of our citizens from the obligations of their bonds, for money due to the United States, would be going beyond what the committee could venture to recommend to the House. 'All duties shall be uniform throughout the United States,' is the peremptory language of the Constitution, and the committee are well persuaded that the petitioners themselves would not, after mature reflection, hesitate to acknowledge, that the Constitution is the paramount law, and that, in granting a privilege to them, to import books free of duty, while the right is denied to others, would be a violation of that justice which is so eminently due to the whole people of the United States; and as, from a late decision of the House, involving the same principle, there can be no reasonable expectation that the petitioners could obtain the exemptions prayed for, the committee recommend that they have permission to withdraw their respective petitions.

The report was agreed to by the House.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE CHASE.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole, made yesterday, on the articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase.

Mr. RODNEY had not been convinced of the necessity or propriety of the amendments adopted yesterday in the Committee of the Whole. For his part he was inclined to believe the articles, for every material purpose, correct as they first stood. It will be remembered that in cases of impeachment by a Legislative body we are not tied down to those forms and technical decisions, which in courts of law are so essential. The maxim is, that they may express themselves in the common language of the country, in common parlance, or loquendum ut vulgus as it is stated in the books. Therefore the words on the trial of a person include everything relative to the trial; it is so laid down by Lord Hale, and he is followed in the opinion by all the able writers who have treated on this subject to the present day. All arrangements previous to the testimony, and argument, are as much a part of the trial as the arguments of counsel. So that were even technical phraseology required on this occasion, the language of the articles comes up to it in this particular. He hoped the House would refuse its concurrence to the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole.

On the question for concurring with the Committee, it passed in the negative; so that article the first remains unaltered, and the like fate attended the amendment proposed to article fourth.

Mr. NICHOLSON meant to require that the yeas and nays be taken upon each article separately.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD would cheerfully join in the call, as he wished to record his vote against every part of this very extraordinary proceeding.

The first article being before the House,

Mr. LUCAS wished to ask if it would be at this time in order to propose an amendment to the first article. He was informed by the Speaker that such a motion was in order. He thereupon proceeded to move to strike out what related to the conduct of Judge Chase, in saying "to the disgrace of the character of the American bench." He moved this amendment from an impression, that the improper conduct of one judge could not be a reflection upon the proper conduct of another judge. If he was one, he should not consider himself disgraced because his colleague had acted improperly; if then, one cannot be disgraced by another, much less can the whole be disgraced by the improper conduct of one. The word bench extends to the whole courts of the United States. He did not like either to use a figurative word for a legal one, such as the word bench for court; he did not rely much upon this, but he thought so serious a matter as that of impeachment ought to be cautiously expressed. Should Judge Chase be convicted on this impeachment, he will be disgraced, but that disgrace will entirely rest upon his own head. He trusted that if his motion succeeded there would still remain enough in the charge to make him highly reprehensible, if found guilty; for it is stated that his conduct was in manifest violation of law and justice, and in open contempt of the rights of juries.

Mr. ELLIOT was pleased with the ingenuity of the gentleman, but he hoped the motion would not prevail, and observed that if they were to have a discussion on every rhetorical flourish, on every trope or figure introduced in the report, they would not get through the business in an age. But the objection against the word bench did not apply, for he considered it one of the most chaste in the whole composition.

On the question the amendment was not carried.

On the question that the House do agree to the first of the said articles of impeachment, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 34, as follows:

The fourth article being under consideration,

Mr. ELMER was not satisfied with that part of the article which charges the judge with criminal conduct in his choice of words in conflicting with the prisoner's counsel; the expressions on both sides might have been unusual and rude, for, from the statement of the trial, it appears that there was some considerable altercation, and he could not see from the evidence how far the conduct of the counsel for the prisoner was correct; perhaps they might have furnished some cause for reprehension, or have excited such a sentiment in the mind of the judge. The other parts of the article he considered of the highest moment, and should give them his hearty approbation.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH observed to the gentleman, that he might attain his object by moving to strike out the parts he disliked.

Mr. ELMER believed he could reach his object in that way, and thereupon moved to strike out the third and fourth sections of the article.

Mr. JACKSON hoped the gentleman would not persist in his motion, and requested him to cast his eye over the sixth article of the amendment to the Constitution, where he would find that the accused person has a right secured to him on his trial, to be assisted by counsel in his defence. If the counsel are deterred from rendering that assistance by the rude and insolent conduct of a judge, such judge may say peremptorily that counsel shall not be heard. It is the same thing in the end, and whatever way it is brought about, it is a heinous crime on the part of the judge, who may, in this way, become paramount to both the law and the Constitution, if such things are permitted with impunity. In the present case, he deemed the third and fourth sections to be of importance, and trusted that if the mover persisted, he would be defeated.

Mr. ELMER acknowledged that indubitably every man had a right to be heard by counsel in his defence, but a Constitutional declaration on that point did not go to authorize counsel to insult the court; he did not say what was the aggravation or who gave it, but he observed in the testimony that much altercation had taken place between them.

Mr. JACKSON called for the reading of Mr. Hay's testimony, already quoted in Committee of the Whole. It was read again.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH hoped the House would not agree to strike out the paragraphs in question. To those gentlemen of the House who have the pleasure of knowing Mr. Hay, it will be deemed sufficient that he had made the statement just read, in order to be fully impressed with its truth. To those gentlemen who are not acquainted with him, an additional reason may be given for its truth. The fact is, that the conduct of the judge on the occasion stated in the article, was such as to excite universal indignation throughout Virginia, and, it is believed, throughout the United States. To allay this irritation and defend the judge's conduct, it has been supposed that the trial of Callender was published; but, be the motives for publication what they may, it is a matter of great notoriety, that the gentleman who reported it was a violent political partisan for the party then in power; and it was generally understood that the printed report of the cause tended to soften the public feelings which had been excited against the judge by the relation of those who had been present at the trial; and on the point of treating the counsel rudely and contemptuously, it ought to be noticed that the reporter acknowledges he was not present on the first days of the trial. That it was not an unfavorable detail of Judge Chase's conduct, might be inferred from this circumstance—that the committee sent for this testimony on the suggestion of a gentleman from Connecticut. But even this report of the trial establishes, beyond a doubt, all the allegations in the part moved to be stricken out; and when you recollect the time it was published, and the appearances at that time, it cannot be supposed it was meant to criminate him. No; it was meant to rescue him from popular odium. Mr. Wirt, one of the counsel, on addressing the court, was interrupted by Judge Chase in these words, "take your seat, sir, if you please." Is this the usual language from the bench to the bar? Let the Clerk read that account of the trial, and you will find it a tissue of damning evidence of every fact set forth in the article.

The question on the amendment was taken and lost.

On the question that the House do agree to the fourth of the said articles of impeachment, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 34, as follows:

The fifth article being under consideration,

Mr. JACKSON declared himself opposed to this article, and asserted that the testimony did not support it. He had read and investigated the act of the Assembly of Virginia, and found that the section relied upon was susceptible of another construction. He quoted the words of the act, and added; here we find that the court may order the clerk to issue a summons, or other proper process. These words are suppressed in the article under consideration. It is a known maxim in courts of conscience, that the suppression of a truth, or the suggestion of a falsehood are equally weak and wicked. And it ought to be deemed equally improper for us to suppress a truth, or allege a falsehood, in so solemn a transaction as that of an impeachment. If after the word "summons," in the article, we were to insert the words "or other proper process," it might go a great way toward altering the opinion of members. What other process can issue beside a summons? If you will not trust a summons, you will take the body; this is a capias. If there be no other than these two writs, it was in the discretion of the judge to order a capias. If a person commits a great crime, though not capital, a capias may be the proper process; for a summons will only be a notice to the party to run off. He, therefore, could not agree to the first part of the article, and the latter part was left unsupported if the other failed. If the court had a right to award a capias, it necessarily followed that the party must be arrested if found, and, if arrested, he must be committed to close custody, or give bail for his appearance; there is no other mode of avoiding imprisonment upon arrest. Has there appeared any proof that Callender made an application to be bailed? If he did not, he could not be refused by the judge. Nothing of this kind has been heard in proof, and until then we ought to withhold our assent to the latter part of the article.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—The laws of Virginia relative to this point, if he recollected rightly, were that, in capital cases, a capias is ordered to issue for the apprehension of the offender, but in cases of crimes, less than capital, a summons, or other process shall issue. What is the practice in that State? He had never understood that it was the practice there to issue a capias for the apprehension of small offences, but a summons to answer at the next court after the presentment.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—My friend (Mr. NICHOLSON) is not mistaken in the law; and the practice, so far as he knew it, was what every reasonable man would suppose it ought to be, that is consonant with the law itself. There are two distinct species of crimes, one capital, the other not capital. The first species is divided into treasons and felonies. The second contains all other lesser crimes. For the first, it is mentioned in the law itself that a capias is the proper process; but in the second it is to be by summons, or other proper process, to the next court. By confining the writ of capias to capital cases it also infers that a capias is not a process in cases under capital. If the court awarded a capias, then, in Callender's case, they did what the law did not authorize them to do, and which the practice in our State courts did not warrant. Instead of this defence of the judge, he suspected the defence would be exonerating the judge at the expense of the clerk, who issued the writ; that being the act of the clerk, they would not hold the judge responsible therefor. It will be recollected that the capias issued after the indictment was found, and that the prisoner was tried in the same term. Mr. Hay, in his testimony, sets this matter in a very clear point of view. The capias was issued by the clerk on the award of the court, at the instance of the prosecuting officer. If, concluded Mr. R., there is one article I put more reliance on than another, this is the very article.

Mr. BECKLEY, the Clerk, read extracts from the laws of Virginia on these two points.

Mr. JACKSON agreed that the conduct of the judge in ruling the party to trial at the same term, he was presented, was a high-handed, arbitrary proceeding; but that is the charge contained in the sixth article which he much approved of, and should certainly vote for. But he had not been influenced, by anything said, to change his opinion; he should, therefore, vote against the fifth article.

Mr. ALSTON observed that the laws of Virginia spoke only of presentment; "that, upon presentment by any grand jury of an offence not capital the court shall order the clerk to issue a summons for the party to appear and answer such presentment at the next court." Callender was indicted, and there being a difference between presentment and indictment, it appears that the court had a discretion as to the time of trial; this however seemed to him to be the case.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH replied by reading the warrant, annexed to the articles of impeachment, in which are the words "to answer a certain presentment found against him (Callender) by the grand jury."

On the question that the House do agree to the fifth of the said articles of impeachment, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 70, nays 45, as follows:

The sixth article being under consideration,

Mr. RODNEY.—As I intend to vote against this article of impeachment, I mean to assign my reasons in as few words as will enable me to be clearly understood. It has been admitted, on all sides, that such interesting proceedings as that in which we are engaged should be conducted with calmness and temper, void of every sensation arising from hostile passions; but particularly when we consider all the circumstances connected with the object of this impeachment—a man of talents, placed in an eminent elevation of office, qualified to ascertain the bearing of your evidence and testimony—too much caution cannot be used, and gentlemen are justified in their minute examination into the relation between the charges and testimony upon which they are erected.

I consider this article objectionable, because there is concealed within it a principle pregnant with mischief to this country; if it be adopted, it will go to establish a principle most dangerous and oppressive. It goes so far as to say that the courts of the United States have criminal jurisdiction at common law. If gentlemen will attend to the article, they will observe that it cites the act of Congress establishing the judicial courts of the United States so far as relates to the regulations of the several States, and they are enacted to be the rules of decision of those courts in trials at common law; and then it goes on to charge Judge Chase with violating this very act. It is the act of Congress which gives life to the act of Virginia in the United States courts, and it says that the statute shall be enforced as on trials at common law. The first inquiry will be, what was the meaning of the Legislature in using the expressions "in trials at common law;" and to ascertain whether Callender was tried by the common law, or under the sedition act? Law writers are not more clear, precise, or correct, on any subject, than they are in their definition of the common law; it is the unwritten law, as contradistinguished from the statute law. A gentleman suggests to me that the common law mentioned in our statute is merely to mark the difference between our admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. We usually refer to English authorities for an explanation of the technical words we borrow from them, and there we find that the common or unwritten law is so called to distinguish it from statute law; and this is the broad line laid down by Virginia herself in a declaration of her Legislature, drawn up by one of the greatest statesmen that ever that or any other country produced. They declare that the United States Government has no common law jurisdiction. All their powers must be exercised in virtue of some statute made under the conditions of the Constitution. In casting our eyes over the Constitution we shall not find a syllable of the words "common law;" the first time it appears, it is in the seventh amendment, relating to debts exceeding twenty dollars.

The judiciary bill refers to the civil jurisdiction of those courts, in cases between foreigners and citizens; but there is no where to be found a word that gives to the United States criminal jurisdiction at common law. Mr. Chase held this opinion himself, as you hear from the affidavit of Mr. Read, who, observing the attack upon Judge Chase in the Wilmington Mirror, reminded him that the sedition act did not protect the judges from libel; they had no cognizance thereof, and it could not be punished but through the State courts. Even in England they paid respect to this distinction. The first trial of Rinewick Williams, commonly called the monster, for his abominable wickedness, in cutting women as they passed him in the street; he was indicted under a particular statute, judgment was successfully arrested, though he was afterward indicted at common law for assault and battery, and convicted.

To make the allegation conform to the principles, it should be said that Callender was tried by the common law. Where was the authority at common law? Callender's was not a civil case, between a citizen of another State and himself. No; it was a criminal case, under a particular statute, and he was tried by statute law, not by the common law. He was confirmed in this opinion by the report of the case, where it appears that such eminent men as Mr. Hay and Mr. Nicholas preferred to rely upon an affidavit for a postponement rather than bring forward the statute of Virginia, alleged to be decisive; they would hardly leave their client in the discretion of the court, when they had the strong language of the law that they should not try the cause at that term; their talents and vigilance forbid us for a moment to entertain the idea that the matter had escaped their notice or recollection.

These are the principal reasons which induce me to vote against the sixth article now under our consideration.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said, if he agreed in the construction which his friend from Delaware contended for, he would not be the last man to join him against the article. He would not support any act that would tend to sustain the pretension that Congress have criminal jurisdiction in common law cases. If this construction could in any wise be put on this article, he here entered his protest against it, as well as against the doctrine itself. One of the first acts of the General Government was, to establish judicial courts on the part of the United States; and let it be recollected that, besides the great national power vested in the courts by the Constitution, there were others vested in them of a peculiar nature. Their authority extended to cases between a State and citizens of another State—between citizens of different States, and foreign States, citizens or subjects. It was enacted that the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require, shall be regarded as the rules of decision in trials at common law. It has always been held as a sound rule of construction that all the words ought to have efficacy, and, when this law of the United States gave life and vital spirit to the law of Virginia, it provided that in all cases at common law the rule of the State should govern, but, in cases under a statute where rules of decision are otherwise provided, the law of the State shall not govern. Congress saw in the outset the necessity of carrying into effect that great Constitutional power of establishing courts and regulating their mode of procedure. Instead, however, of establishing any mode of their own, they adopted the modes already existing in the several States, and there is no other mode except in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. If the laws of the State where the offence has been committed does not apply, what possible rule of procedure or decision could govern the court? In what manner is a criminal trial to be conducted? The 34th section, under any other construction, becomes absurd and nugatory. He did believe, that, by the 33d and 34th sections of the act establishing the judicial courts, the laws of the several States have been adopted by Congress in criminal as well as in civil cases.

But the gentleman from Delaware asks us how we can believe this to be the just construction, when the able counsel assigned to the defence in this case failed to produce this law to the court, which would have procured them the direct attainment of their end, without applying to the discretion of the court? To this he answered, he could not tell why they omitted to bring forward this objection. This was not his concern. It might, perhaps, have escaped their memory. But will it be an objection, that, because they failed; we also should fail, who think this law has been violated. That the law of Virginia was the rule of conduct adopted in this case, is proved by every preliminary as well as subsequent step. If, then, they did not make this exposition of the law of the United States, why was the trial, in all other parts, conducted consonant with the laws of Virginia. He stated the case in another point of view. Although there is no common law jurisdiction of the United States in criminal cases, yet there is in each State a peculiar common law generally drawn from England, but varied so as to suit their purposes. Suppose Virginia had never modified the common law of England as it relates to the law of descents, and suppose a claim brought in the United States court by a citizen of North Carolina for a tract of land in Virginia, (it will be admitted that Congress can make no law in relation to descents,) how is the court to be governed?—by the law of descents in North Carolina, or by that of Virginia, or by the common law of England? Certainly they must conform their decision to the rule of Virginia, where the land lies.

Take this common law doctrine, then, in any other sense than as being in contradistinction to our admiralty and maritime code, and it has no basis for common law jurisdiction; Congress have none in criminal cases, as all such cases must be constituted crimes by a statute of Congress, previous to their perpetration, and a statute or written law is the opposite of common, which is an unwritten law, made up of usages, time immemorial. If it was established that this article tended in any shape to establish the exploded doctrine, that the United States had common law jurisdiction in criminal cases, he would readily vote against the article.

Mr. NICHOLSON entertained no doubt but the term of common law expressed in the statute establishing the courts of the United States, was used as a term of definition, and that it ought not to be construed to give the courts any additional jurisdiction, nor to abridge them of any they possessed. He observed in other parts of the law, that the words common law are used to distinguish that mode of procedure from what was used in our courts of admiralty. In England, they had three district courts governed by three distinct modes of proceeding, under three laws. The common law courts, or the courts at Westminster, and the chancery court, are governed by the common law. The admiralty courts are governed by the civil law, and the ecclesiastical courts by the ecclesiastical law; but all and every one of these are governed by the statute law. But in their mode of proceeding, each has its own peculiar rules, yet they are all bound to conform to a statute, as if a statute had originally given them jurisdiction. In our own courts, he believed, it would be difficult to conduct trials without some provision as to the mode. Bills of exchange and promissory notes were not made current until the time of Queen Anne. The suit on these actions is still at common law, as was the case mentioned in the article. And, with the gentleman from Virginia, he asked in what manner a criminal can be prosecuted but by the rules of the common law, unless you have him to be tried by such arbitrary ones as the court may make at the time, in order to suit their own purpose? If it be true that we have no rules of proceeding established for our courts of justice, it is high time to set about making them. But the fact is, that rules are established, and the reason why they were established in the manner they are, is, that in this way Congress expected, and justly too, that they would give more satisfaction to their constituents to leave them to the rules of proceeding they had long been accustomed to, than they would by introducing a novel set of their own contrivance. And he sat down fully convinced that the circuit court was bound to proceed through the whole case by the rules established in Virginia.

And then the main question being taken that the House do concur with the select committee in their agreement to the said articles of impeachment, as originally proposed, and hereinbefore recited, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That—Managers be appointed, by ballot, to conduct the said impeachment on the part of this House.

The House proceeded to take the said motion into consideration; when, an adjournment being called for, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 5.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be directed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, further provision is necessary to be made, by law, for carrying into effect the tenth article of the Treaty of Friendship, Limits, and Navigation, with Spain, so far as relates to exemptions from duties, charges, and fees, arising upon the whole or any part of the cargo of such Spanish vessels as may be wrecked, foundered, or otherwise damaged, on the coasts or within the limits of the United States, where, from the insufficiency of the vessel, it becomes necessary to export or relate the same upon our bottoms, and that the committee have power to report by bill or otherwise.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE CHASE.

The House resumed the unfinished business of yesterday, viz: the appointment of Managers to conduct the impeachment of Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the United States, and having directed that the number should consist of seven, the House proceeded to ballot for the same; and upon examining the ballots the following six members were elected, having a majority of the whole number of votes, viz: Mr. J. RANDOLPH, Mr. RODNEY, Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. EARLY, Mr. BOYLE, and Mr. NELSON.

The House then proceeded to ballot for the seventh Manager, and it appearing that Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL had the plurality of votes given in, but not a majority,

The SPEAKER, supposing that the rules of the House in the case of committees chosen by ballot was applicable to that of Managers, declared Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL duly chosen.

A conversation arose respecting the precedents on this subject, in which it was apparent that on all former occasions a majority of the votes had been given in favor of each Manager; but this appeared in the instance of the impeachment of Judge Pickering, rather from the recollection of gentlemen who spoke on the subject than from the Journal.

DECEMBER, 1804.

Mr. SPEAKER had not recollected how the election was conducted, but he should not regret an appeal to the House on his decision.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH, impressed with respectful sentiments of the understanding and integrity of the SPEAKER, would be the last man to appeal from his decision; but for the purpose of preventing what either had heretofore taken place, and what may hereafter take place, in case of such decisions, involving the House or individual members in very unpleasant situations, he would move an appeal to the House from the decision of the Chair.

The question was immediately taken, and 25 voted in favor of the SPEAKER's decision, 50 voted against it; of consequence, the decision was reversed.

And the House proceeded to ballot a third time, but no member had a majority. At a fourth ballot the result was the same. On the fifth ballot Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL had a majority, and was declared to be duly elected.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLSON, it was.

Resolved, That the articles agreed to by this House, to be exhibited in the name of themselves and of the people of the United States, against Samuel Chase, in maintenance of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors, be carried to the Senate by the Managers appointed to conduct the said impeachment.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House have appointed Managers to conduct the impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and have directed the said Managers to carry to the Senate the articles agreed upon by this House to be exhibited in maintenance of their impeachment against the said Samuel Chase; and that the Clerk of this House do go with the said message.

THURSDAY, December 6.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Governor of the State of Virginia, enclosing a return of the election of ALEXANDER WILSON, to serve in this House, as a Representative for the said State, in the place of ANDREW MOORE, appointed a Senator of the United States; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, from the committee appointed on the sixteenth ultimo, presented a bill making farther provision for extinguishing the debts due from the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. NELSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the nineteenth ultimo, the petition of Samuel Carson, of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, made a report thereon; which was read, and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That a bill be brought in, agreeably to the prayer of the said petition; and that Mr. NELSON, Mr. JONES, and Mr. THATCHER, do prepare and bring in the same.

A Message was received from the President of the United States transmitting a report of the Surveyor of the Public Buildings at Washington. The Message was read, and, together with the papers, ordered to lie on the table.

PRESERVATION OF PEACE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the more effectual preservation of peace in the ports and harbors of the United States, and in the waters under their jurisdiction.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD had doubts respecting the propriety of several parts of the second section, and he wished the gentleman who reported the bill would explain the intention of them. If he understood it, the section made a provision for the warrant of the State officer to arrest an offender who shall have fled on board an armed foreign vessel, and in order to give aid to the process of the State, provision is made to call in the United States authority, to call out the militia to secure the execution of a State warrant. The Constitution gives to Congress the power of calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions. Here is an express authority given to Congress to aid civil officers by the militia in executing the laws of the Union; but it is silent as to the calling in the aid of the militia to execute the laws of a particular State. If there is any part of the Constitution from which gentlemen infer that Congress possess authority, he would be glad they would point it out, as he had never heard of it before.

Another part of which he doubted was this. He had already said that the State officer was to be aided in the execution of a State warrant beyond the jurisdiction of the State; if the officer goes out of his jurisdiction he goes beyond his authority; consequently he acts without any authority. Now the last part of the section declares that if any person shall be killed in resisting the civil authority in a place not within the body of the county, but within the jurisdiction of the United States, it shall be justified. Why introduce this provision? Again, it is declared that if any of those concerned in making the arrest be killed in the place not within the body of a county, but within the United States jurisdiction, those engaged in resisting the civil authority shall be punished as in cases of felonious homicide. The sheriff not being invested with any power to make arrests out of his proper county, if he does so, and commits homicide, why justify him? Why should he not be subjected to the same punishment as others who commit the crime of homicide? If the sheriff, or one of his party, following a person out of his county into some other place within the jurisdiction of the United States or any other place out of the limits of his legal bounds, and is resisted in making his arrest, the arrest being illegal and without the county, the resistance may be legally justified. If these objections are unfounded, the gentleman will be good enough to show in what; and at the same time we shall be glad to hear what are the rea-

Mr. NICHOLSON admitted there might be some difficulty in the provisions of the section, but he flattered himself they might be got over. He considered this as the most important part of the bill, and he wished to preserve it in order to prevent or punish in future the offences which had last year been committed with impunity. From the information he had received, the greater part of the offences committed last summer were committed in the body of a county; those particularly which universally excited the most indignation of the citizens of the Union, were committed either in the body of a county or within the jurisdiction of a State; some were committed within the jurisdiction of the United States, but the greater part were committed in the places before mentioned. Hence, it becomes necessary that some provision should be made for taking offenders, when the strength of a county or State is insufficient to arrest them. The objections of the gentleman from Connecticut are two-fold; first that we have no Constitutional authority to call out the militia to execute the State laws; next, that a State officer has no authority to go beyond the jurisdiction of the State to execute his State process. On the first point Mr. N. had entertained strong doubts himself, when contemplating the subject; but on looking into the Constitution again, there did not appear to be so much room for doubting as he had first apprehended. The Constitution provides that Congress shall have power to call forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, &c. The laws of the Union may be exclusively considered the laws passed by Congress. But may not the laws of every State be also considered as laws of the Union? Every State forms a part of the Union. How far a State has the power to call out the militia for the purpose of executing its State laws, he could not determine, but it appears that Congress have the power to call forth the militia, not only to execute the laws passed by Congress for the whole Union, but to execute the laws passed by each State, as each State is a part of the Union; the whole forming one confederacy, the whole are interested in the due execution of the laws of each.

The subsequent part of the Constitution provides for suppressing insurrection; and he asked if insurrections might not be against the authority of the State, as well as against the United States, and he further asked if a resistance to the civil authority about to execute process may not be termed an insurrection, when a process is issued under the authority of a State, as it would be, if the process issued under the authority of the United States. If the Northampton insurrection had arisen from opposing the execution of process from the State of Pennsylvania under its own laws, instead of opposing the process issued from the district of Pennsylvania under the law of the Union, would it not have been as much an insurrection against the authority of the State, as it was against the United States? He thought, upon the fullest consideration he had been able to bestow on the subject, that in passing this section we should not overleap the boundary of the Constitution, believing the laws of every State to be a part of the laws of the Union.

The second objection may perhaps excite some doubts in the minds of some gentlemen; but he begged leave to suggest a case that might happen, and probably will happen, in which he thought a State officer would be justified in going beyond the boundary of a State to execute his process. The body of the county of New York extends upon the water to the northeast end of Staten Island; from there to Sandy Hook, is not in any county, but within the jurisdiction of the State. If the crew of a vessel lying below Staten Island should come up to the city of New York and commit outrages upon the citizens—say, should perpetrate murder, this is an offence against the State; the United States could issue no process in this case. The State officer therefore issues his; the sheriff proceeds to serve it, the crew leap into their boat, push off, row down below Staten Island and get on board their armed vessel; would not the sheriff be authorized to pursue them, even if they went without the Hook? He believed he would be justified in doing so; but he acknowledged it would not be proper to pursue them into Jersey; because the Constitution makes provision for the pursuit of fugitives from justice seeking an asylum in another State; but he might pursue and take the offender within the limits of the United States. He is offending against no jurisdiction, but pursuing an offender against a State law, which is a part of the United States. To illustrate farther, he stated that Congress had the right to authorize a State officer to execute State process within the territory of the United States. Have they not the power to authorize an officer of the State of Maryland or Virginia to execute a State process within the Territory of Columbia? There is nothing in the Constitution, nor in the acts of cession, that prevents us. If then we authorize State process to run into the District of Columbia, shall a murderer or fugitive from justice take refuge here, and escape punishment, because he is beyond the limits of the State in which the offence was committed? He trusted that such a result would not be contended for; but that every gentleman would aid the object of the bill, which was to prevent in future the commanders of foreign armed vessels from insulting American shipping in our ports and harbors, or in the waters under the jurisdiction of Congress.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD.—The remarks of the gentleman have not proved to my mind that I was mistaken. He supposes, in respect to the first idea I suggested, that Congress has a right under the Constitution to call out the militia to execute the laws of a State, because a State being part of the Union, so are its laws a part of the laws of the Union. If this proposition is true, if the laws of a State are the laws of the Union, they must bind the Union, for it is the nature of laws to bind those upon whom they operate. Now will that gentleman tell me that the laws of a particular State are obligatory upon the whole Union? The Constitution does not bear along his idea; it only means that the laws passed by Congress are the laws of the Union. Of course no power is given by the Constitution to call forth the militia to execute the laws of a particular State. He conceives that under that part of the Constitution making provision against insurrections, Congress might call forth the militia to suppress an insurrection against the authority of a State. Be that as it may, this bill does not contemplate calling out the militia for that purpose. It merely confines itself to the execution of a magistrate's warrant; therefore that part does not authorize the passing of a law of this kind. Mr. G. was aware that the militia might be drawn out to aid the civil arm, where it could not effect its object with the assistance of the posse comitatus. But he had always thought that the Executive of the State authority was the proper organ to call forth the militia to execute their own laws. And are the States to be now deprived of this power? By the Constitution, Congress have the power of organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and of governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States; but to the States is reserved the appointment of officers, and training, and he had ever understood that the States had the right of commanding their own militia and calling them forth to execute their own laws. This being the case, where is the necessity for Congress undertaking to legislate on this point? The States having competent authority for the purpose, why not leave it to them? If any States should think it necessary to call out the militia, they could do it with as much despatch and as effectually as the United States; and all of them, he believed, had laws for the purpose. If any of them had not, they would soon pass them if they saw their necessity.

To the second objection the gentleman has replied; but it cannot be conceived that a sheriff having a warrant can ever be justified in going out of his jurisdiction to execute it. He admits that the warrant shall not run into the State of Jersey; not because the Constitution provides for reclaiming the offender, but because the jurisdiction of New York does not extend to the State of New Jersey. If this is a reason in that case, it must be a reason in this, and a sheriff cannot go within the jurisdiction of the United States to execute his warrant any more than he can go into that of a neighboring State. It is, perhaps, competent to Congress to pass a law to return an offender that has fled from justice within their territory; but they cannot extend the State process beyond what the State itself directs. They may, perhaps, be authorized under the authority of exclusive legislation, to pass a law directing offenders who seek an asylum in the District of Columbia, to be delivered up to an offended State. But that is not the object of the present bill, nor is there any provision of the kind contained therein. Entertaining these sentiments he moved to strike out the second section.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—The gentleman does not consider the laws of the particular States as part of the laws of the United States, because they are not obligatory over the whole Union. Mr. N. alleged that a law passed by a State, conformable to its constitution, was as obligatory over all the people of the Union who went into that jurisdiction, as a law passed by Congress was obligatory over the whole people who resided within the United States. The laws passed for the government of the District of Columbia were also binding over the whole Union, though they did not operate upon any person but those who are within the ten miles square. So the laws of every particular State are binding on the Union pro tanto, for as much as they extend to. But the gentleman makes no remarks upon my second observation, that the United States have a right to allow the officers of a particular State to execute their warrants within the exclusive territory and jurisdiction of the United States. The Constitution does not prohibit us from exercising this authority any more than the constitution of any State prohibits its Legislature from granting a similar indulgence to its neighbor. If New Jersey was to pass a law authorizing the officers of New York to pursue an offender and arrest him in the State of New Jersey, could it be complained of, or would it be said that the act of a sheriff making such an arrest was illegal, and that resistance would be justifiable? In fact, Virginia and Maryland have actually such a mutual regulation, and a person escaping from justice may be arrested by the officer under process from either State.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said there undoubtedly were difficulties arising out of this subject, but generally they had been satisfactorily answered by his friend from Maryland, (Mr. NICHOLSON.) The situation of the United States in relation to the individual States, it is well known, differs from that of every other Government under the sun. The waters in our harbors are generally under the jurisdiction of the State Governments, while the mouths of those harbors are under the jurisdiction of the United States. And if the position is true that the United States cannot authorize a State officer to execute his process, when an offender shall have escaped into the waters under the United States jurisdiction, the case is irremediable. And it will be known that the most daring outrages committed within a State are to be passed by with impunity if the criminal escapes beyond the State boundary into that of the Union. This was a doctrine to which he never could accede. He saw no good reason why a State might not as well have the privilege granted of executing its process within the jurisdiction of the United States, as of reclaiming offenders flying from justice into other parts of the Union. He deemed it prudent to fortify the arm of the State with the strength of the United States. There is, however, one part of the clause that had not been satisfactorily supported to his mind. He did not understand how the Congress could enjoin it upon a magistrate to call out the militia to execute a State warrant. He was not satisfied either as to the right, the constitutionality, or propriety of the measure. The Constitution, when it speaks of calling out the militia, confines the object to three things: to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrections, and repel invasions. Congress may call forth the militia to execute the laws of the United States, but not to execute the laws of a particular State. The States individually have the right to call forth the militia of their own States to execute their own laws, and the United States have also the power to call forth the whole militia of the United States to execute the laws of the Union. He had no doubt of the propriety of giving the States authority to execute their process within the limits of the United States jurisdiction; but he doubted extremely the authority of Congress to call out the militia for the purpose mentioned in the bill; that he conceived to belong to the State authority, and the State alone was competent to its execution.

The doctrine of the gentleman (Mr. R. GRISWOLD) on another point was not so correct. It will be recollected that the individual States could neither raise an army nor create a fleet; yet armed vessels may commit, in our waters and in our ports and harbors, the most violent outrages upon the persons and property of the citizens; and this miserable quibble is to enable them to elude a nation's justice. We cannot, we are told, extend the jurisdiction of a State, nor aid her with the national force; surely the lives and fortunes of our citizens are not thus tamely to be sacrificed.

Suppose murder to be committed in the harbor of New York by a citizen or a foreigner not belonging to an armed vessel. This may be considered as a crime against the State, and which the State authority is competent to punish. But if murder is committed by the crew of an armed vessel, is not such an armed force equivalent to an invading foe? If a man came from Canada into Vermont, and was to commit a similar outrage, would not the civil power of the State apprehend him, and punish him with death, if his crime was of such enormity as to require it? And shall an armed vessel be permitted to outrage the person and property of our citizens on the Atlantic shores because she has the strength? He would be glad to see a remedy more complete than the one mentioned in this bill. He would like to see such a force repelled by force, not by the civil arm. He would like to see the armed vessels employed in disturbing our peaceable commerce blown out of the water. He wished to see our American officers and seamen lying yard arm and yard arm in the attack, and the question of peace or war staked on the issue, if the conduct of such marauders was justified by the Government of the nation to which they belonged. This language may appear different from what he had constantly used; but our situation was also different. Heretofore he was not disposed to engage in hostilities for the protection of our navigation; but we then had no maritime force. We have since created one. If we had no Navy, we could not meet them on the ocean; but having one, he would apply it to the best purpose—that of efficaciously defending our ports and harbors—and would struggle till the whole of our marine was annihilated, if in the contest Britain should not leave us a single ship. Though we lost all, we should not lose our national honor; though we should not beat her on the ocean, we should save our reputation. But to suffer insult to be added to injury, is indeed a degradation of national honor, and ought never to be borne with, let it come from any nation whatever.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD did not say that Congress had not power to authorize the individual States to send their process into the territory under the jurisdiction of the United States. That point could not be a question on this bill, because that power is no where proposed to be given. The objection was, that without having given the State power to send its process within the United States jurisdiction, you say that if the person making the arrest, or the person intended to be arrested, shall be killed within the jurisdiction of the United States, it shall be justified; or if any person aiding the sheriff be killed by those resisting the civil authority, they shall be punished as in cases of felonious homicide. He was desirous that some efficacious mode of resisting or repelling the aggressions upon our commerce should be adopted, and the peace and security of our country effectually secured for the future.

Mr. ELLIOT.—The question has some traits of peculiar importance, and it would be desirable at all times to harmonize the conflicting claims of the State and General Governments. He could have wished that the doubts upon his mind had been dispelled by the ingenious explanation of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. NICHOLSON.) But instead of being dispelled they were materially strengthened by his observations. We are told that the laws of the Union embrace the laws of the individual States. That the Constitution gives us power to call forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union; but it no where says that we may call forth the militia to execute the laws of the particular States. Are the State laws then laws of the Union? One gentleman affirms that they are, and another gentleman denies it. Let us inquire for a moment what is the meaning of the phrase, Union. The first paragraph of the Constitution says, We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union. Again, new States may be admitted by Congress into this Union; and in section 4, article 4, the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of Government. Surely it means the combination of the whole, and those only are the laws of the Union which are made by the representatives of the whole Union. If the laws of the individual States are laws of the Union, because a State is a part of the Union, then every by-law of every city, borough, town, or corporation in the United States are laws of the Union, for these also are parts of a State in the Union. How stands the question now? By the Constitution you have no power to execute a State law; yet you assume that power if you pass this bill. It is said the State laws are binding over the Union. They are only binding on those who reside or come within the limits of the State, and not on citizens residing and remaining in other States without their limits. An inhabitant of Jersey is not bound by the laws of New York while he remains on this side of the North river. You might as well say that the State laws were binding upon the universe, for a State is a part of the universe.

Mr. J. CLAY suggested to Mr. R. GRISWOLD to vary his motion, so as to strike out only that part of the section which related to the call of the militia by a State magistrate, and let all that relates to the Army and Navy stand. For although a State had the power of calling out its own militia to enforce the execution of her own laws, yet she could not call upon the regular troops or Navy of the United States, and this force he considered as a necessary aid in the cases alluded to in the bill.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD intended, if the section was struck out, to introduce a new one in its stead, declaring that the State process may be executed within the jurisdiction of the United States on the seaboard, and then adding a permission to the State to call in the aid of the Army and fleet of the Union.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH asked if he understood the gentleman right. Did he mean to authorize the State officer to execute his process within the United States jurisdiction, and make the killing of the officer or his assistant a felonious homicide?

Mr. R. GRISWOLD meant to give the power to the State officer expressly, and in that case, if resistance be made, most indubitably it is felonious homicide.

Mr. NICHOLSON was not convinced by anything which had been said, that Congress have not the authority to call out the militia in order to secure the execution of the State laws; but he was not generally tenacious of his opinions, and he would be the last man in the world to give his assent to the assumption of powers not granted by the Constitution, and if any reasonable doubt existed he would certainly refrain from pressing the question. He had no objection to the alteration proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. CLAY,) but he could not consent to strike out the whole section, as he conceived it gave the very authority contended for by the gentleman from Connecticut. He wished the bill to be rendered as efficacious as possible, and in order to remove the objection raised by doubts as to the constitutionality on account of calling forth the militia, he was willing to strike that part from the bill.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL.—This section contains a principle of much importance, although not yet touched upon by any of the gentlemen who have engaged in the discussion; and the manner in which the House may now decide thereon will go to fix a precedent upon which the freedom and independence of the individual States may be placed in jeopardy.

The first object in the section is to authorize a State officer, acting under the State authority, to go beyond the limits of such, and of course beyond its jurisdiction, to execute State process upon an offender escaping from justice. He did not believe that the United States were competent to give such authority, or that the United States could extend the laws of the several States beyond the boundaries of the State for which they had been enacted. For this reason he meant to oppose giving this authority to a State officer, but he would be clearly in favor of making such provision as would more effectually preserve peace in the ports and harbors and waters of the United States, and at the same time remove the doubts suggested by gentlemen on both sides. He would be for introducing into the bill, instead of the present section, a provision, that when such a crime shall have been committed, and the party charged had escaped into the United States jurisdiction, the State officer having received the State process might exhibit the same to a proper officer of the United States, who should issue a new warrant, and upon such warrant the offender escaping should be arrested. This he conceived to be the only mode in which Congress had a Constitutional right to reach their object, or to aid the State government in apprehending offenders. He was clearly of opinion that the powers of a sheriff could only correspond with those vested by the writ, which never did more than command the person to be taken, if he be found within your bailiwick or county; if you extend his powers in the manner contemplated in the bill, the State officers of Philadelphia will be despatched with State process to execute in Charleston.

He had always been of opinion that each State had a right to call out its own militia to carry into effect their own laws, and that the United States cannot require it of any State officer to call forth the militia to carry into effect the laws of such State; but he was also of opinion that Congress may authorize a State officer to call upon the United States officers to aid in the apprehension of fugitives from justice; but here we could only authorize them, and not compel them to make such call; if we could, we should annihilate the very existence of the State governments. This provision being made he would go further, though he was not willing to authorize every justice of the peace to call to his aid the military and naval forces of the United States, yet he was inclined to draw out this force whenever it became necessary under the direction of a proper officer to carry into execution a State process, where a State was incompetent to that object.

He would briefly mention another objection. It was to that part of the section which relates to punishment in case of resistance. He conceived this to be altogether unnecessary. When the United States authorize their officer to execute a process, he is armed with all the requisite power for its accomplishment; and as long as he acts within the authority given to him he will be justified in his conduct; and all who oppose him will be guilty of such crime as is known to the laws in the quarter where opposition may be given. This part of the bill appeared to him to be unnecessary, and if unnecessary it would be found also inconvenient. Whether the killing of the officer or his assistants was murder or manslaughter would be determined by the facts, and the punishment in either case would be found under the State law, adopted from the English law, to which a court would have to turn for its decision.

Mr. NICHOLSON wished that gentlemen, before they found fault with the bill, would pay a more particular attention to its provisions. The gentleman last up had supposed this bill enjoined upon the State officer, as a duty, that he should call in the aid of a military force to execute the State laws. That was not the case; the bill only says it shall be lawful for him so to do. It was observed some days since that our statutes affixed a punishment to the offence of resisting a civil process, consisting of fine and imprisonment; but this being a different crime when attended with killing, it became necessary, in order to remove doubts as to what punishment should be inflicted, that it be simplified and expressed in the law itself. He held himself ready to agree to the amendments suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. CLAY,) which he expected would satisfy every member, except the gentleman last up from Tennessee.

Mr. NELSON took this opportunity of expressing, in the most public and most explicit manner, that he should on all occasions vote against every measure which went to aggrandize the power of the United States at the expense of the individual State governments, or the authority of the people. It is at this day admitted that the General Government have no other powers of jurisdiction than what are granted by the people in the Constitution; that the powers not delegated therein, or prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. The section before the committee contains two important regulations—one of which he considered as just and proper; the other not, as warranted by the Constitution. Nay, it would be a direct infringement upon the rights of the individual States. The section contemplates giving authority to the State officers to call out the militia of the State to execute its own laws, and thereby take the command of that force out of the hands of the Executive authority, where the State constitutions generally placed it. He admitted the right of Congress to call forth the militia in cases of invasion or insurrection, and to execute the laws of the Union; but exclusively of these cases authorized by the Constitution, he was bold to say Congress had no right to interfere with calling the militia into service. The command of the militia he considered as a sovereign power, and as such it could not be exercised by two sovereign authorities, as that would destroy the very idea of sovereignty, which was an exclusion of all other authority than one; the State Executive could not call forth the militia, and the Congress exercise the like power at the same time. He should always hold up his hand against such interference with the State sovereignties, or an assumption of power by Congress in this case, as well as other analogous cases.

Some gentlemen have entertained doubts whether Congress have power to authorize a State officer to execute process within the United States jurisdiction; if Congress have exclusive jurisdiction, it is competent for them to point out the manner in which it shall be conducted, and the persons by whom. The States of New York and Connecticut may mutually agree that the process of each State may take effect in the other. This is a principle so plain that it cannot be doubted, and it never ought to have been doubted but what Congress may in like manner permit a State process to be executed within its exclusive jurisdiction.

His colleague (Mr. NICHOLSON) had made a distinction on enjoining it upon a State officer to call out the militia, and said that only gave him the power to do so if he deemed it requisite. It is true that it is not enjoined as a duty, but it is nevertheless equally true that you assume to take away the power of a Governor of a State, and give the authority to a justice of peace, intended by the State constitutions to be exclusively within Executive and Legislative control. He should therefore vote in favor of striking out that part of the section, giving to judges or justices the power of calling out the militia, while he meant to favor that part extending the power to the civil officer of the State to make an arrest within the territory of the United States, or waters under its jurisdiction, in cases of fugitives from justice.

Mr. DANA had no objection to the second part of the clause, so far as it went to preserve peace in our ports and harbors, or maintain the rights of a State against every foreign aggression whatever. The general idea of combining the force of the United States, and the force of an individual State, he thought unobjectionable as to its principle, and gentlemen differed merely as to the detail. True, the manner of conducting this operation was important, and required deliberation in order to avoid the establishment of a precedent, which might hereafter be drawn out to support an unconstitutional authority. In respect to the first point, calling forth the militia to execute the State laws, he did not see that it need be considered as an insuperable impediment; because although the United States could not call them forth to execute a State law, yet the States themselves possessed the power, and would no doubt provide for its efficacious exercise in carrying their respective laws into full effect. But a doctrine that had been broached for the first time in the course of this debate, was a subject of an alarming tendency, and in his opinion was contrary to the whole scope of the Constitutional powers granted to the General Government of the Union. It is said that the laws of particular States are laws of the United States, because the States are a part of the Union. The Constitution declares it to be the duty of the President to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and he is to commission all officers of the United States. Is it meant that the President shall see to the execution of the laws of each particular State? This will give a vast range to Presidential authority. But this is not all; for if you extend your view to the end of this construction, it will be found that the judicial authority is co-extensive, and they will pass judgment of right upon the State laws. It is very well known that the laws of the several States are of two kinds—part statute and part common law; and this will extend their jurisdiction to all cases arising at common law. Grant this sweeping clause its whole range, and it will enable the courts of the United States to draw every litigated subject within their own cognizance. This is a step which surely gentlemen are not prepared to take at this time.

With respect to the latter part of the section, he was prepared to go the whole length. He would furnish the whole force of the United States to support the peace and independence of the States, and to vindicate lawful commercial pursuits, against any or every nation that dare attack them. He assented to the position of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. J. RANDOLPH,) and was willing to risk the question of peace or war upon the issue. He was not anxious to strike out the section; he did not know but it might be as well to recommit it.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL explained in what he conceived he had been mistaken by Mr. NICHOLSON, and declared his willingness to go as far in the protection of our commerce, and preserving peace within our waters, as any gentleman on the floor; the only point in variance was as to the mode. He wished it might be done in conformity to established principles in law and in right reason, keeping altogether clear of Constitutional embarrassment.

The question on striking out the second section of the bill was carried in the affirmative—61 being in favor of, and 41 against it.

A motion was then made by Mr. R. GRISWOLD for the Committee to rise and report the bill, with a view to its recommitment to a select committee. This being negatived—

The Committee continued discussing the details of the bill.

Mr. J. CLAY proposed to amend the bill by declaring that all unlawful search, or other vexation, or impressment of any of the crew of trading vessels coming to or going from the United States, should be punished in the manner defined in the fifth section.

Upon some desultory conversation, and it appearing that the idea embraced by the amendment was provided for by other words in the bill, the amendment was lost.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH observed that it was not surprising so much variation in sentiment had been disclosed. On the contrary he was surprised there had been so little. For he conceived it the most arduous task that had ever devolved upon a committee to report at once a bill perfectly satisfactory in its details on a subject as novel as it was important. The great difficulty was in providing against the clashing of the two jurisdictions in the execution of a State process. He thought it would be best to create the offence, and leave to the State the mode of punishment in ordinary cases; but where offences were committed by foreign armed vessels, he conceived the United States and the States might have a concurrent jurisdiction.

The Committee rose and reported progress.

FRIDAY, December 7.

Mr. JACKSON, from the committee appointed on the sixteenth ultimo, presented a bill making provision for the application of the money heretofore appropriated to the laying out and making public roads leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio river; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

On a motion made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a post road ought to be established from Knoxville, in the State of Tennessee, by the most direct and convenient route that the nature of the ground over which it is to pass will admit, to the settlements on the Tombigbee river, in the Mississippi Territory, and from thence to New-Orleans; and that a post road ought also to be established from—in Georgia, to the said settlement on the Tombigbee, to intersect the former road at the most convenient point between Knoxville and the Tombigbee.

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate will, at one o'clock this day, be ready to receive articles of impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to be presented by the managers appointed by this House.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the managers appointed on the part of this House to conduct the impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, reported that the managers did, this day, carry to the Senate the articles of impeachment agreed to by this House, on the fourth instant; and that the said managers were informed by the Senate, that their House would take proper measures relative to the said impeachment, of which this House should be duly notified.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations ought to be made in the militia laws of the District of Columbia; and that leave be given to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. LEWIS, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee, appointed on the twenty-third ultimo, "to inquire into the expediency of extending the time for claimants to lands under the State of Georgia, lying south of the State of Tennessee, to register the evidences of their titles with the Secretary of State," and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported a resolution thereupon, which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the further time of three months ought to be allowed to claimants to lands under the State of Georgia, south of the State of Tennessee, to register the evidences of their titles with the Secretary of State of the United States.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. CLARK, Mr. CUTTS, and Mr. BRYAN, do prepare and bring in the same.

DUTY ON SALT.

Mr. THOMAS said, he rose with a view to propose an inquiry relative to the duty on salt. On this article a duty of six cents per bushel was first laid, in the year 1790 it was raised to twelve cents, and in the year 1797 eight cents more were added, making the duty twenty cents per bushel of 56 lbs.; at which rate it now stands. But, as every measured bushel of good strong salt which is imported into this country will weigh 80 or 90 lbs., this is in reality a duty of 30 cents per bushel.

Three years ago, when the repeal of the stamp act, excise, and other internal tax laws, were before Congress, an attempt was made to reduce the duty on salt, and retain a part of that system.

At that time, although he was conscious the duty on this article of real necessary consumption was too high, and fell extremely heavy on the agricultural part of the community, particularly those living back from the sea-board, who were obliged to use large quantities of it, for their black cattle and other beasts of pasture, notwithstanding the increased price at which it came to them, in consequence of the transportation, and the profits charged on the amount of duty as well as original cost by the several merchants or traders through whose hands it passed, yet he did believe it better to allow this duty to remain as it was, a while longer, rather than not be enabled to abolish that expensive, inconvenient and anti-republican system of internal taxation.

And should it now be found, on due inquiry, that a reduction of the duty on this article, at this time, would be incompatible with the great object of paying off the national debt and meeting the other exigencies of Government, for his part he would not urge it; but he was persuaded this was not the case—he believed our finances are amply sufficient to authorize the measure.

On examining the report of the Secretary of the Treasury he found, that besides meeting all the calls of Government, including the sum appropriated annually towards the reduction of the public debt, there is a surplus of $4,882,225 in the Treasury, and although there are several payments to be made out of this sum, there will still be a large balance remaining.

It also appears, from a comparative view of the bonded duties of the present with former years, that there will be an increase of revenue coming into the Treasury the ensuing year, and he believed there was no reasonable probability of any new causes for expenditure.

This being the case, he flattered himself, it would not be deemed unseasonable or improper to propose a reduction of the duty, on this article of necessary consumption, at this time.

With this object, however, said Mr. THOMAS, I wish to couple another which I consider of equal importance, as it respects the reputation of our beef, pork, fish, and butter, put up for exportation, as well as the health of our seaport towns, and seamen employed on foreign voyages.

He said by the Treasury accounts it appears that the aggregate amount of salt imported into the United States during the year, ending the 30th September last, was 3,858,195 bushels of 56 lbs. each, of this about one fourth part or 868,355 were imported in foreign vessels. All this salt was brought from foreign places, and no part of the salt prepared from the briny waters near the Onondaga, in New York, the various springs in the Western States, and the sea water of Cape Cod, Portsmouth, &c. is taken into this calculation.

Of this salt some parts came from the Swedish, Danish, and Dutch West Indies—other parts were imported from the British West Indies, and other British colonies, from the French West Indies, from Spain, from Teneriffe, and the other Canaries, and the Spanish West Indies; parcels of the same salt were likewise brought from Portugal, Maderia, Cape de Verd Islands, and Italy, and about 20,000 bushels of a similar kind has heretofore annually been brought from Louisiana, which is now a part of the United States.

But notwithstanding all this trade in salt, to so many parts of the earth, the commerce in that article between the United States and Great Britain is very extensive and important. During the year he before mentioned, the proportion of imported salt which was furnished by England alone, and of the manufacture of that country, amounted to 1,271,537 bushels of 56 lbs. So that it is evident at least one third of the salt consumed in our country is exported from that part of Great Britain called England, and chiefly from those countries of which Liverpool is the mart.

This salt, as he understood, was prepared by the process of boiling the brine of the rock salt from Cheshire, and the water of the sea; and on account of the great plenty and cheapness of coal in Lancashire, there being also, as he believed, no export duty laid on it, this salt was produced in abundance and sold on very low terms; it is employed as ballast for British ships coming into our ports, and when arrived is sure to sell and pay the freight and frequently afford a profit; our own ships also very commonly take it in for ballast, and often as part of the cargo.

This traffic would be perfectly fair and convenient if English salt was of a strength and quality fit to preserve animal flesh for provisions. But he was clearly of opinion, from his own knowledge, this was not the fact, and he had lately observed a discussion on this subject in the British Parliament which confirmed that opinion.

The British Government long ago made a distinction between English salt and foreign salt on their importation into Ireland. To encourage the introduction of salt from the Bay of Biscay and the Portuguese dominions, they permitted it to be imported into that kingdom at the rate of 84 lbs. the bushel, while Liverpool salt was charged with the same duty of two shillings on the bushel of 56 lbs. The reason of this distinction was undoubtedly wise and cogent; experience had proved that British salt, as brought to the market, was destitute of that purity and strength which was necessary to preserve animal flesh from taint and corruption, and fit for human food in hot climates and on long voyages.

The trade of Ireland in beef, pork, and butter, was of great importance, not only to that country itself but to the whole navy and army of Britain. To keep up the character and wholesomeness of their provisions was a matter of immense national importance, and this could only be done by attention to have it preserved with salt of purity and strength. Experience had proved that the salt formed by chrysalization in the open sunshine on the western shores and islands of Southern Europe, was vastly better than that produced by artificial concretion, in a boiling heat over a fire in the North. And the Government had with prudent discernment favored the introduction of Bay salt into Ireland, by permitting 84 lbs. to be imported for the same duty that was paid on the introduction of 56 lbs. of Liverpool salt.

The people of Liverpool have lately expressed uneasiness at this partiality, and an attempt has been made in Parliament, so to equalise the duty, as to give to both Bay and English salt a fair competition in the Irish market. This, however, was repelled by the Irish members, with manly discernment and spirit; on the ground, that Bay salt was of a stronger quality, less easy to dissolve, and indispensable to the salters of meats; that English or Liverpool salt would not answer for this extensive and important branch of business; that the discrimination in favor of Bay salt was politic and proper, especially connected with the provision trade and the health of the fleets and armies.

It is my wish, said Mr. T., that such a distinction should be made on the introduction of English salt into the United States, as has been made by the British laws themselves, on its importation into Ireland. There certainly exists the same causes for it. Like Ireland, our country abounds in provisions—beef, pork, fish, and butter, are great and staple articles of export; but their quality is very far inferior to the provisions of Ireland. The putrefaction of beef, pork, and fish, to a very serious extent, has often occurred; the loss of the property thereby was great, and the reputation of our provisions materially affected. But that was not the greatest evil; there is no doubt but that the exhalation from tainted and corrupted meats and fish, in our towns as well as on board our vessels, poison the atmosphere and excite malignant fevers and other diseases.

His object was to retrieve and establish the reputation of our salted provisions in foreign markets—to prevent the loss of property by those who put up provisions for exportation, and also to prevent the evils resulting to our citizens and seamen from tainted and spoiling meats and fish. With this view of the subject he should propose in the first place, an inquiry into the expediency of reducing the duty on salt generally; and, in the second, the propriety of making a distinction, so as to encourage the importation of strong and pure salt, in preference to the weak and impure salt manufactured in England.

He, therefore, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the duty on salt, and also into the propriety of making a distinction in the duty, so as to encourage the importations of salt from the dominions of Denmark, Sweden, the United Netherlands, Spain, France, Portugal, and the British West Indies, in preference to any other place or places; and that they report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said that the resolution which the gentleman from New York had submitted, and in relation to which he had favored the House with such copious details, embraced two objects: the reduction of the duty on salt, generally, and the encouragement of the importation of a particular description of that article. The last subject belonging to a class which was consigned to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, he should confine himself to the first branch of the resolution; nor should he have troubled the House at all were not the motion of the gentleman from New York calculated to excite an expectation, which he wished to repress, because he feared it could not be gratified. It was not to oppose inquiry, but to apprise the mover and the public that the result was likely to prove unpropitious to his wishes, that he had risen. The country on which the salt duty fell with peculiar force was that middle region, near enough to the seaboard to be supplied altogether by importation, but too remote to have its consumption diminished by vicinage to the sea. Those whose stock had access to salt water felt the duty but partially; those whose situation obliged them to use salt of home manufacture only, not at all. As an inhabitant of that district of country by which the duty was principally paid, and as a friend to agriculture, he had at an early period of the session, in conjunction with his friend the Speaker, turned his attention to the practicability of reducing the duty on salt, and you well know, sir, (said Mr. R.) that the result of our inquiry satisfied us that this desirable object was not at present attainable. He mentioned this to show that other members felt an interest in this subject, as well as the gentleman from New York, although they had not brought it before the House. The Treasury statements on which that gentleman relied for the support of his position, that we can dispense with a portion of our existing revenue, establish the opposite opinion, beyond controversy. The estimated revenue of the ensuing year, after defraying the estimated expense, yielded only a surplus of $210,000, and the specie value in the Treasury, which the gentleman had brought to his aid, was large indeed, but charged with near four millions of dollars on account of Great Britain, Maryland, and American claims upon France, whose payment we had assumed by convention with that Power. The delay of these claims which were expected to have been paid and for which we had made provision accordingly during the present year, had swelled the specie balance in the Treasury, but certainly had not liberated that resource. On this subject what was the inference drawn by the head of that Department? precisely the reverse of that of the mover of the resolution. "As the greater part of these demands will be paid in the course of the year 1805, the balance will not, probably, at the end of that year, exceed the sum which it is always expedient to retain in the Treasury." The House would recollect that by our last accounts our flotilla was bombarding Tripoli. Who could answer for its fate? Who could undertake to say that, before the Christmas holidays, intelligence might not be received from that quarter (as was the case last year) which would render it necessary to impose new burdens, instead of taking them off? The remarks which he had offered were not in opposition to the motion of inquiry. He thought it his duty, and was always ready to go into every profitable research, whether it tended to diminish the public burdens, or to promote the agriculture, trade, or manufactures of the country. He had their interests much at heart. He was as much interested in lowering the impost on salt as any member in that House could be, but he felt it to be his duty explicitly to state that the object at which the resolution aimed was illusory. If, however, the prosperous condition of our affairs should experience no reverse, if our Mediterranean warfare should have a speedy and honorable termination, if we should continue to maintain a pacific position between the belligerent nations of Europe, and no unforeseen calamity should befall us, he had a well-founded expectation that we might dispense with the additional duty of eight cents on salt, at the next session of Congress.

Mr. JACKSON, impressed with the importance of the subject, hoped it would be referred to the committee; and he would assure the gentleman from Virginia that the district of country over the mountains was greatly affected by the duty, for they did not procure salt in sufficient abundance in the interior to answer their consumption; salt usually sold there from  $3\frac{1}{2}$  dollars to four, and when it is considered what the merchants and traders advance was a per cent. upon the first cost, it would be readily allowed that the citizens in the western country did not pay less than one dollar per bushel. If, however, the public exigencies are absolutely such as the duty cannot be dispensed with, he would be one of the first to vote against the reduction. But the House will not refuse its assent to reduce the duty, because it is possible that dangers may occur, or that it is possible we may go to war with other of the Barbary Powers, or even with all the world; for that too is possible. So desirous was he of getting rid of of this duty, that he would rather postpone the payment of the public debt a little longer, than oppress the people with such an unequal law. Unequal and oppressive as it was to his constituents, yet he was satisfied they would willingly bear it, if it should prove on investigation that its repeal would endanger our finances or create a failure in the payment of the public debt in a reasonable time.

Mr. THOMAS had no objection to adopt the idea of Mr. J. RANDOLPH in referring the second part to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD said the effect of reducing the duties on salt would be the loss of $220,000 annual revenue, which was more than its present excess; and as to the four millions in the Treasury, that would speedily be required to pay the bills drawn upon the Secretary on account of the purchase of Louisiana, and the whole of it was appropriated. He called for a division of the question; whereupon the first part respecting the repeal of the duties was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

After this question, the second part could neither be debated nor amended, and a question to refer it was lost.

MONDAY, December 10.

Two other members, to wit: MATTHEW WALTON, from Kentucky, and NATHANIEL ALEXANDER, from North Carolina, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the disposal of certain copies of the laws of the United States," to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill to provide for completing the valuation of lands and dwelling-houses, and the enumeration of slaves, in South Carolina, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

Ordered, That the report of a select committee, appointed on the eighteenth of October, one thousand eight hundred and three, "to inquire by what means the mail may be conveyed with greater despatch than at present, between the City of Washington and Natchez and New Orleans," made the thirteenth of December, in the same year; as, also, a supplementary report on that subject, from the same committee, made on the twelfth of January, one thousand eight hundred and four, be referred to the Committee of the Whole, to whom was referred, on the seventh instant, a motion respecting "the establishment of a post road from Knoxville, in the State of Tennessee, to the settlements on the Tombigbee river, in the Mississippi Territory, and from thence to

New Orleans; also, for the establishment of a post road from —, in Georgia, to the said settlement on the Tombigbee, to intersect the former road at the most convenient point between Knoxville and the Tombigbee."

A memorial and petition of Joseph Peppin, in behalf of the Upper Mississippi Company, was presented to the House and read, stating that the said Mississippi Company are ready to enter into a negotiation for a compromise of their claims to the title of lands within the territory ceded to the United States by the State of Georgia, agreeably to the conditions and limitations of the cession of Georgia, with any commissioners, who may be authorized thereto by the Government of the United States, the said Mississippi Company reserving all their rights at law, in case the compromise should not be effected; and praying that Congress will come to a final determination on the subject-matter of the said claims, during the present session.—Referred.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred, on the thirtieth ultimo, a petition of sundry citizens of the county of Washington, in the State of Pennsylvania, complaining of an undue election and return of John Hoge, to serve in this House as one of the Representatives for the said State, made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Mr. EPPEs, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to amend the charter of the town of Alexandria; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

A message from the Senate communicated to the House certain proceedings of the Senate, relative to the impeachment of Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

ADJUDICATION OF PRIZES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill establishing a court for the adjudication of prizes, in certain cases.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD said there was some difficulty occurred to his mind in the very outset of the bill. The Constitution of the United States declares that all their judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour. Yet the first section of the bill declares that the judge of this court shall hold his office during the existence of the war between the United States and any of the predatory Powers of the States of Barbary; and the ninth section goes still further in abridging the duration of the office, by giving power to the President to abolish the court when he may think proper. By the Constitution, the President is empowered to nominate, and by and with the advice of the Senate to appoint judges; but nowhere, by that instrument, is he authorized to abolish a court or annihilate the office of a judge of the admiralty, as this section attempted to authorize him to do. He asked the gentleman who reported the bill to justify this arrangement of a judge of admiralty holding his office either during a war, or at the discretion of the President. In order to try the principle, he moved to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. RODNEY did not know that he had it in his power to satisfy the scruples of the gentleman from Connecticut; but, if he had, he would endeavor to remove them. He considered this case as one sui generis, dependent upon its own peculiar circumstances; and he should not bring into view the question, extremely analogous, which had been so much controverted a few years back, but had been then set at rest, namely, that judges, appointed under the law of the United States, when once the courts were abolished, and their jurisdiction taken from them, shall not still continue judges of the land, and receive a salary for being idle, or worse than idle.

The case of last session, in forming a temporary government for the Louisiana Territory, was precisely on the principle of the bill, and the gentleman will find, upon inspecting the law, that the judges in that Territory only hold their offices for four years. The tenure in that case is a term of years, and is surely as strong a case as the one to be provided for by the bill, both courts being erected, or to be erected, out of the original limits of the United States at the time of adopting the Constitution; and he believed the Constitution, when it declared that the Judges of the Supreme Court and inferior courts should hold their offices during good behaviour, confined itself to the then territory of the Union, and not to judges out of the United States. There is another section of the Constitution which gives to Congress the power to make all laws necessary for carrying into execution the other powers granted by that instrument, and under this power it becomes Congress to make provisional regulations for temporary contingencies, and we are authorized to establish a temporary Judiciary out of the United States, because the exigency occasioned by the exercise of the Constitutional power of declaring war imperiously calls for it. Without such a provision as that contemplated in the bill, our gallant tars would be fighting to little effect, if there was no judicial authority for the condemnation of Tripolitan vessels after capture. The terms of the Constitution do not apply to cases of this kind. This question was talked over in the select committee, and the committee were unanimous that we were as much at liberty to fix the duration of the judge's office in this case as we were to fix the term of four years as the period of the establishment of the courts in Louisiana.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD said the case did not compare. The Judiciary power vested in the judges of the Territory of Louisiana, was not that Judiciary power of the United States mentioned in the Constitution, and therefore the variation of the tenure might be justified; but in the present case they were about to vest a judge with the proper Constitutional power of an United States judge, exercising admiralty jurisdiction, which is a regular Judiciary power of the United States; and although it was to be exercised out of the territory of the United States, it was, nevertheless, the power alluded to in the Constitution, and an inferior court to be established by Congress, the judge of which is to hold his office during good behaviour; and no gentleman on that floor could deny that this judge was bound in his decisions by the laws of the United States binding on the district and other judges of the Union. He did not see that the point he had made out on the present question was the same as that alluded to in the repeal of the late Judiciary law. What was then contended for was the repeal of the law, and not whether Congress had the power of removing the judges. The present was not repealing a law in order to abrogate the office, but it was creating a new court and providing for the appointment of a judge thereto, who by the Constitution is to hold his office in that court during good behaviour. Yet this bill declares that the office shall be limited to the war with the Barbary Powers. He did not think that the measure was warranted by the Constitution.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said that this was an old question in a new shape; it was not in the same words, but it turned upon the same pivot. If Congress possessed the power when a court became useless to abolish it, certainly they had the power when creating a court for a particular purpose to declare that, when that purpose was answered, the court should be discontinued. Where was the difference between creating a judicial court now and at the end of the Tripolitan war (or any definite period of time) annulling it, and specifying in the law creating the court that it should cease and be discontinued at the end of the Tripolitan war, or at any definite time hereafter? So far as related to the judges there was more of speciousness in the claim of him who entered into an office the term of whose existence was not defined in the law creating it, than of him who knew when he accepted an appointment that on a certain contingency, or at a certain time, his office was to cease and be discontinued.

In regard to the ninth section, without seeing it in the very objectionable point of light in which it was viewed by the gentleman from Connecticut, he thought the bill would be as well without it. Whatever might be the relative situation which he might hold on that floor, he should always be averse to an unnecessary accumulation of patronage and power in the hands of the Executive. The salary bill the next session of Congress, supposing peace in the meantime to be made with Tripoli, was no object.

Mr. ELLIOT did not view the subject in the same point of light as the gentleman who had preceded him. He did not consider the first section as limiting the duration of the court, but merely authorizing the President, by and with the advice of the Senate, to appoint a judge of admiralty in the territory of some foreign nation at war with the same nation with which we are now at war. But the ninth section gave the President the power of abrogating this court after it should be established. He would never consent to give the President the power to abrogate any judiciary tribunal whatever. He should therefore vote for retaining the first section and subsequently for striking out the ninth.

Mr. NELSON, as one of the committee who had reported the bill, begged to be permitted to assign some reasons in its defence. He did not pretend to understand the forms of proceeding in this body. The short time he had had the honor of a seat on this floor forbade his aspiring to that knowledge; but in all the legislative bodies with which he was acquainted, it is not deemed parliamentary to argue against the first section of a bill that the last section is imperfect or incorrect. When a bill is to be considered by sections, the merits or demerits of each is to be considered by itself. Now the first section does not fix the time at which the law shall expire or the office shall cease; and although the Constitution says that judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour, who is there here that can say that this office may not last during the life of the judge, nay, may not last to the end of time, for no man can say when the war will end? But admitting it to be in order to refer to the ninth section while discussing the first, he would ask how did that infringe the Constitution? The power to abolish the office is fixed somewhere, and when once abolished, and the officer left with nothing to do, will it be yet contended that he shall still be entitled to receive his salary? Does the Constitution prohibit Congress from making a judge a justice, or a commissioner, call him what you please, on an extraordinary emergency, and insist upon his holding such office during good behaviour? He had always construed differently. The idea of a tenure during good behaviour in the office of a judge was borrowed from England, and there it was considered as a great point gained over the Crown, by which they were appointed, and upon which they had heretofore been wholly dependant. But was it ever contended that the British Parliament, including King, Lords, and Commons, were incompetent to dismiss them from their seats? It never was so contended, nor it never can be so contended with success; and though the President has not the power to remove inferior judges, yet the Legislature may remove them with their offices, and the body of the people may remove them by an expression of their sovereign will; but perhaps these remarks are unnecessary, and need not be dwelt upon. He would vote against striking out the clause.

The question was taken on striking out the first section, and lost without a division.

Mr. LUCAS moved to strike out the ninth section, and assigned for reason that Congress ought not to attempt to do that indirectly which could not be done directly. The fundamental principle of the Constitution was the separation of the Government. The judge, therefore, ought to be independent of the Executive for the tenure of his office; by this section he is rendered altogether dependant upon the will of the President. There is no limitation as to the time or to the power which the Executive may exercise over the judge. He may not hold his office even during the present war, for during the present war it is only made lawful for the President to appoint such an officer, and by this section it is also made lawful for him to abolish the same when in his opinion it shall be proper to do so. It may be said that the judge cannot be removed, unless the court is suppressed. This is but an evasion, for the President has not the power of actually removing him, yet he can virtually do so, and the effect upon the judge is exactly the same. This power is unconstitutional in itself, and dangerous as a precedent. He hoped it would not be granted, nor did he see any necessity for it on the ground of expediency, even supposing Congress had a right to vest the power in the President. It is well known that Congress is enjoined by the Constitution to meet annually, and if the usefulness of the judges should cease on the cessation of the war, the inconveniences which may ensue, or the expense which might accrue, would be short and inconsiderable, for Congress will meet in nine months after the close of the present session. It will be therefore better to leave it to Congress to abolish this court when they see cause for it, than transfer the power into other hands.

Mr. RODNEY had no great objection to striking out the clause, because he thought the bill adequate to its object without it. The eighth section, he observed, established a principle that had heretofore been considered of considerable importance, viz: that a judge shall not receive a salary beyond the time he continues in the exercise of the duties of his office. The committee had supposed it possible that a speedy end might be put to this war, and thereupon conceived it unnecessary to charge the Treasury with the payment of the judges and others compensations beyond the term of service. He was himself much averse to vesting in the President any unusual or extraordinary power; but he thought a proclamation by the President was an official proceeding proper to attract the attention of the Executive authority of foreign nations to its subject-matter. He was the proper organ to express the will of the law, and to give information to those interested. Although in all human probability, the war will not continue long, he had no objection to the clause being struck out.

Mr. SMILIE said, if it had not been in the bill, the bill would have been well enough without it; but as it was in, he was not inclined, through an unfounded jealousy, to strike it out. He would ask gentlemen to point out any probable ground for jealousy of the President in the exercise of this power; for he took it for granted that the Constitution furnished no obstacle. Its injunctions in regard to judges holding their offices during good behaviour, extended to the courts of the United States, within the limits of the several States represented on this floor. Now the law itself cannot affect the person or property of any citizen within the United States, and as its usefulness may suddenly cease after the close of the session, he did not see why we should subject ourselves to a single dollar's expense, which might be prevented by the immediate publication of the President's proclamation.

Mr. LUCAS was not governed by jealousy of the Executive in making his motion. The present Executive possessed his entire confidence; but when we are legislating, we do not legislate on the confidence we have in the Executive, but on those circumstances which are most likely to procure happiness to our fellow-citizens, and secure their liberties on the basis they have themselves established them; and my colleague will recollect that the Executive will not always be filled by the same person, and that a change of men may produce a change of measures, if the man is the standard of legislation; but if we legislate upon principles, the principles will remain after the persons who propounded them are forgotten. He did not consider the inference made by his colleague (Mr. SMILIE) correct, for he did believe the officers and seamen employed in the marine of the United States were particularly interested, and that they were citizens of the United States. He observed, upon the remark made by Mr. RODNEY, that foreign nations would be more likely to take notice of the President's proclamation than of a law. He did not see that the President would be prevented from issuing his proclamation in the event of peace, if the abolition of the court depended upon Congress.

Mr. G. GRISWOLD expressed a jealousy for the preservation of the Constitution, and conceiving the proposed regulation in enmity with one of its most important injunctions, he hoped it would be struck out; and he, for one, would never give his consent that a judge, under the Constitution of the United States should hold the tenure of his office by Presidential will.

Mr. SOUTHARD differed with gentlemen who thought the section a violation of the Constitution. The law itself grew out of the exigency of the war with the Barbary Powers, and it so expresses itself. It therefore carries its own remedy with it; during the existence of the war, and so long as any nation at war with the same Power shall consent or permit the United States to establish a judge of admiralty within its territory, so long shall the office remain, but no provision is made for its remaining any longer. Nor can the judge complain of the abolition of his office, or consequent loss of salary, because he consents to receive it upon the terms of the law. He considered the section a proper one, though not absolutely necessary. If peace takes place the President will be the first person to know it, and his proclamation of the cessation of the court will render it of greater notoriety than any law can possibly render it. One more observation, and he had done. It may be suggested in favor of a determinate abolition of the court, that the judge may become arbitrary, and the court prove injurious, in which case the sooner it was abolished the less would be its evil.

Mr. DANA thought the section very objectionable. It is true it does not say that the judge shall hold his office during the pleasure of the President and no longer, in those precise terms, but it says what is tantamount, that when, in the opinion of the President, it shall be proper so to do, it shall and may be lawful for him, by proclamation, to abolish the said court. This is not the precise form of expressing the pleasure of the Crown; the President must manifest his pleasure by proclamation; the Crown might manifest its pleasure privately before the act of settlement; but the power of the judges, in both cases, is held by the loose and insecure tenure of will and pleasure. Gentlemen cannot set up a good distinction between judges of courts of admiralty, acting within or without the boundaries of the United States; and, if you once declare that the President shall have power to dismiss one of your judges, nothing can prevent you from giving him power to dismiss them all. The principle, once established, goes through. For his part, he was decidedly against granting such power. The question ought not to be considered for a moment on the light ground of being a good or a bad bargain for the judge; but on the broad and solid ground of preserving what remains of the due administration of justice.

Mr. RODNEY would not have risen again but in consequence of Mr. DANA's remarks and refined distinctions where there was no difference. The bill provides that the judge shall receive his salary as long as he has jurisdiction, and that jurisdiction is limited by the duration of the war. This itself is a limitation of the office. The President has no power over the individual person of the judge; he cannot turn out A and put in B. So the tenure is not precarious; it is fixed, and depends upon the abolition of the jurisdiction; and that principle is strictly conformable to what was formerly decided to the general satisfaction of a great majority of the people.

The observation of the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. R. GRISWOLD) respecting a distinction between judges within the limits of the United States and within the Territory of Louisiana, concluded nothing; for he will find the judges of that Territory exercising all their functions under the Constitution and the laws of Congress; and he believed there was a time when the gentleman had thought differently on the subject before the Committee. He referred to the yeas and nays called on passing a bill limiting the duration of office in respect to the judges or justices of the Territory of Columbia, by which they are continued in office for the term of five years only, while the Constitution declared, as it does now, that judges of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour. He hoped the gentleman would abandon the idea of the officer continuing to receive a salary after the office was abolished.

Mr. DANA had no idea of an officer totally destitute of office, receiving a salary, but until he was divested of all official authority, he ought to be independent, and salary was but a mere contingency.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said that the first section established the court during the continuance of the Mediterranean war, and the ninth gave a power to the President to abrogate it at his discretion. He thought the section, to say the best of it, superfluous. So soon as we, or the nation within whose limits this court shall be erected, shall have made peace with Tripoli, its jurisdiction would terminate by the provisions of the bill itself. It might indeed be expedient to prolong the existence of the court beyond the term contemplated by the bill, but no circumstances could arise which would render it necessary to shorten it.

Mr. EUSTIS thought the judge ought to hold the office during good behaviour, and yet this section makes him dependant on the Executive. Congress could not vest the Executive with any power which they had no right to exercise themselves, yet this section proposes to do so; and, on this precedent, occasion may hereafter be taken to frustrate and contravene the Constitution in its most important regulations.

Mr. JACKSON meant only to make a single observation, with a view of rescuing the section from the inconsistency charged upon it by Mr. EUSTIS. The first section was not at variance with the last. The first declared the duration of the office to be during the war; the last, that the President may, by proclamation, abolish the court. There might be something formed as a substitute to designate the precise duration of the court, as, from the mode of expression used in both sections, it seemed not sufficiently definite.

Mr. GREGG would vote for striking out, unless his colleague (Mr. LUCAS) would modify his motion, for he would never vote to vest the President with the power intended to be given by the ninth section; yet he thought that a modification of the clause would cure the defect without striking out. If the time was precisely defined for which the court should continue, the President might notify the expiration of the office by proclamation.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD said, the gentlemen who advocate this measure appear to differ in this construction. Some entertain an opinion that the first section does not limit the tenure of the office of the judge; other gentlemen think the office limited by that section to the duration of the war. He thought the first section explicit, that the President should appoint a judge of, the admiralty during the existence of the war, and, in conformity with this idea the second section was penned. The said judge shall exercise the admiralty jurisdiction for trying captures in the said war; these last words show expressly the limitation of the law. The true and fair meaning of which is, that the judge shall hold his office during the war, and no longer. The ninth section gives the power to the President, of shortening this period, and it was this power he believed the Constitution never meant should be exercised by the Executive. As to the observation about the judges or justices of this District, it did not bear on the present question, the Constitution providing only for the tenure of offices held by the judges of the supreme and inferior courts of the United States, and not for justices of peace; besides, in the District of Columbia, the Constitution gave them the power of exclusive legislation.

Mr. J. CLAY would vote for striking out, with a view to add a new section in its stead.

On the question to strike out the ninth section, the House agreed thereto without a division, and

Mr. J. CLAY moved a new section declaring that the existence of the court should terminate with the war, and that the President should make proclamation of that event.

This section was agreed to—ayes 51, noes 45.

No other amendments being made, the Committee rose and reported progress.

TUESDAY, December 11.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter addressed to him from George Washington Parke Custis, chairman of a meeting of the inhabitants of the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, enclosing sundry resolutions of the said inhabitants, expressive of their disapprobation of so much of a motion now depending before the House, as relates to a recession of jurisdiction to the State of Virginia, of that part of the District of Columbia which is contained in the county of Alexandria, aforesaid.—Referred.

On motion of Mr. EARLE, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of granting to persons claiming lands in the Mississippi Territory, by virtue of any British or Spanish grants, farther time for registering their claims agreeably to an act passed the third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee."

Ordered, That Mr. EARLE, Mr. ALEXANDER, Mr. TIBBITS, Mr. WILSON, and Mr. LYON, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

The proceedings of the Senate communicated yesterday by their Secretary, relative to the impeachment of Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States were read, and are as follow:

"In Senate of the United States.—High Court of Impeachments, Monday, Dec. 10, 1804.

"THE UNITED STATES VS. SAMUEL CHASE.

"Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to issue a summons to Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to answer certain articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, on Friday last. That the said summons be returnable the second day of January next, and be served at least fifteen days before the return day thereof.

"Ordered, That the Secretary carry this resolution to the House of Representatives.

"Attest: SAM. A. OTIS, Secretary."

Ordered, That the said proceedings of the Senate do lie on the table.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill establishing a court for the adjudication of prizes in certain cases: Whereupon so much of the said bill, as amended, as is contained in the ninth section thereof, was recommitted to Mr. RODNEY,

Mr. JACKSON, Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. LUCAS, Mr. NELSON, Mr. LARNED, and Mr. LOWNDES.

Mr. NELSON, from the committee appointed on the sixth instant, presented, according to order, a bill for the relief of Samuel Carson; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act concerning drawbacks on goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from the district of New Orleans," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

POTOMAC RIVER.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing the Corporation of Georgetown to make a dam or causeway from Mason's Island to the western shore of the river Potomac.

Mr. MACON gave it as his opinion that it would be improper at this time to take up the subject, as there was a motion on the table to recede the territory of the District back to the jurisdiction of the States out of which it had been carved. If it is intended to recede the territory, it would certainly be better to recede with as few encumbrances or alterations as possible; indeed, the striking propriety of the business taking the course he had just mentioned, had led him to expect that the present bill would not be again agitated until the question of recession had been investigated and decided. He would therefore move that the Committee rise and report progress.

Mr. SMILIE voted against going into a Committee of the Whole, on the ground mentioned by the Speaker. If it be the intention of the Legislature to recede this territory, there was certainly no necessity of discussing the propriety of erecting a causeway; if it be not the intention, when this is manifest it will be time enough to consider the bill before them. From what he had observed on the part of the inhabitants of the District of Columbia, there seemed to be a disposition, if not a determination, to give Congress as much trouble in legislating for them as they had for all the rest of the Union. During the present session, this single ten miles square had occupied as much of the time of the House as the whole of the United States, whose general and important business was daily caused to be suspended for the local concerns of this place. From observing this to be the settled course of proceeding, he was convinced that Congress must do one of two things, either recede them to their respective States, or put them in a situation capable of managing their own affairs, in their own way. The daily pay of the members amounted to a considerable sum, and the length of time consumed on every trifling application for want of some member able to explain the true situation of the District, occasioned by its unrepresented state on this floor, were evils much to be lamented, if they could not be remedied. He thought members could hardly justify the waste of time, intended to be devoted to the public, whatever they might think of the expense it occasioned. He hoped the Committee would agree to rise.

Mr. LEWIS did not think it fair to anticipate the opinion of the House on the subject of recession, which he considered would be the effect of the Committee's rising. If, however, the Committee shall determine that they would not, at this time, discuss the present bill, he had no objection to enter on the consideration of the other subject.

Mr. NELSON thought this the proper time to discuss this question, even in preference to that of recession. It appears from the petition of the inhabitants of Georgetown, that the channel of the river, on which the salvation of that town depends, is filling up daily; that the mass of mud would soon increase to such a degree as totally to ruin the navigation to that port. If even it should be agreed by Congress to recede the territory to the States of Virginia and Maryland—which he wished and hoped in God would not be the case—it would be late in the session, and in all probability, at a time when neither of those State Legislatures will be in session. Supposing both States were willing to accept the recession, which he believed would not be found to be the case, the petitioners could not apply to the Virginia Legislature until next December, as their session began in that month, nor to Maryland until next November. A twelvemonth's delay might defeat the object altogether, for the petitioners assert that it requires immediate exertions to prevent the channel filling up altogether.

Again, if the question of recession must be first decided, he saw that it would be an everlasting obstacle to the consideration of the propriety of the measure contemplated by the bill. Suppose a number of gentlemen, opposed to the consideration of the question on recession, should join with those opposed to the erection of a causeway, the subject will never be called up, neither at this, or any future session. When a petition is presented from Georgetown to be allowed the object of their present prayer, it is in the power of any gentleman inclined to vote against that measure, to lay on the table a motion for recession, and the two will sleep side by side on your table till the rising of Congress. The same argument for this course of proceeding will have as much weight at any future period as at the present time. Hence he inferred that now was the proper season for investigation, and the sooner a decision was obtained, the better. He did not think the subject of recession ought to have been introduced on the present occasion, as it did not necessarily connect itself with an improvement of the navigation of the Potomac.

Mr. MACON had stated his reasons for making the motion, and the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NELSON) had replied that the main question would be eternally suspended, if his (Mr. MACON's) arguments were allowed to prevail; this did not appear to follow from the premises. If there is a majority in favor of the causeway, and the minority attempt to defeat the will of the majority by introducing the question of recession, nothing is more easy than to remove that or any other obstruction thrown in their way. The majority may call up the motion made by my colleague (Mr. STANFORD) to recede the jurisdiction to Maryland and Virginia this day if they please; and when they have it before them, it is an easy matter to reject it, and proceed to their favorite measure of damming up the western half of the river.

Mr. NELSON.—Mr. Speaker tells us it is easy for a majority to reject anything they disapprove; true, but when a motion has obtained access to your table, it would be deemed ill-manners for any gentleman but the individual who introduced it, to call it up to the attention of the House with a view to turn it out of doors. Politeness, or common civility, will permit every gentleman to carry on the business he introduces here, in his own way; it was for this reason that he had said it never would be called up, but stand an eternal obstacle in the way of the required improvement.

Mr. SLOAN reminded the Committee of an old saying: "The time present only is in our power, the future we know not of." The time present then, is the time to redress the grievances of the suffering part of this community, and as the citizens of Georgetown were really embarrassed, and their apprehensions excited of greater danger, he hoped the Committee would proceed with the business.

Mr. STANFORD seldom troubled the House with any motion; but the one alluded to by his colleague, (Mr. SPEAKER,) he had brought forward from a sense of duty. The reiterated applications of the inhabitants of this District for Legislative provisions, he had always listened to with attention, and he had no objection to proceeding in the discussion of the present bill, convinced that it would only serve to show the necessity of receding the territory. From all that had hitherto been done, it was apparent that they could not attempt to accommodate one part of the District without drawing forth petitions against the same from another part. Counter-petitions were constantly coming in. He was willing to hear everything, but he did not believe the House could agree to anything, and it was not to be wondered at when the inhabitants could not agree among themselves; or, if the House agreed at this time relative to the objects of the bridge company and the causeway petitioners, it would be, he suspected, to do nothing in either case. All this tended to evince the propriety of adopting the resolution he had laid on the table to recede the territory to the States of Virginia and Maryland, who would then have competent powers to gratify both parties, if they deemed it expedient, of which he was convinced they were better judges than this, or any future Congress was ever likely to be.

The question on the Committee rising was taken, and lost—only forty-three members voting in the affirmative.

Mr. MACON then proposed to amend the bill in such a way as to provide for regulating the ferries that might be established across the eastern part of the stream to the causeway, and applying the fund arising from the same for the purpose of keeping the causeway in repair.

Mr. LEWIS did not consider it useful to travel over the ground assumed on a former occasion, but would confine himself to state to the Committee some information he had acquired since, in respect to the damage the Eastern Branch or the port of Alexandria was likely to sustain, as had been alleged. Before the year 1784, the channel on the western side was so shallow that vessels only of very ordinary burden could pass, while on the Maryland side vessels of great draught of water could easily pass up to Georgetown. The uncommon hard Winter of 1783-'4 was followed in the Spring by the greatest torrents ever known in the Potomac. The bodies of ice were of immense magnitude, and many of them lodged upon the island, and under the rocks of its bed, prising with a force beyond all credibility: it tore the rocks asunder and pressed them over into the new channel, occasioning a rise of thirty or forty feet on the Georgetown shore. On the Virginia side the torrent also forced itself and deepened that channel, while it left a vast quantity of mud, rocks, and sand, in the eastern channel, which has been constantly accumulating since that period. The situation of the present bar is at the meeting of the two arms of the river, below the island, and does not permit the passage of vessels over it drawing more than twelve feet water. The consequence of this alteration in the bed of the river below the island has been to narrow the mouth of the Eastern Branch, but it had no effect upon the harbor of Alexandria. This may serve to explain what may be the effect of opening the old channel in the way proposed: it may operate to widen the mouth of the Eastern Branch harbor, but it cannot injure Alexandria.

With regard to the objection stated by his colleague, (Mr. PLATER,) in relation to the power given to the Corporation of Georgetown to tax the additions to that town, he could assure the Committee that almost every person in Georgetown had signed the petition; and as no objection had been made by any portion concerned, (though the bill had been a long time before the Committee,) he considered it a tacit acknowledgment on the part of those who had not signed the petition that they wished the measure might be adopted and carried into execution. He felt particularly solicitous for the erection of this dam, as it regards the interests of the citizens in the western parts of the States of Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania; for if no steps are taken to improve the navigation below Georgetown, the navigation will soon become so shallow as not to permit sea-vessels to come to Georgetown to carry off the produce which may descend by the Potomac and its improved canals. The destruction of Georgetown will follow the loss of the navigation, and the Western farmers will lose a choice of two rival markets.

While he was up, he would add a few words with respect to the right which Congress have to legislate on this subject. He differed entirely from those of his colleagues who held that Congress had no jurisdiction over the river Potomac, because it never was ceded by Virginia. The State of Virginia ceded to her dividing line, and it was immaterial whether that dividing line was high-water mark on her shore or the middle of the channel; for as Maryland has ceded all she had, she cedes up to the Virginia line, wherever that may be; for he held it to be sound law that you could not convey a body of territory without conveying all its appurtenances, unless expressly reserved, and neither State had made a reservation of any right, or a part of any right. Suppose A and B should hold two adjoining tracts of land, and A should sell to C all the tract he held, and B should also sell to C all his adjoining tract, would not the whole of the property of A and B thereon, of what nature soever it might be, vest solely and exclusively in C; and if a road passed along the line of A upon the land of B, or part on each of their lands, would it be contended that C could not keep it in repair, or improve it for his own and his neighbor's accommodation, without obtaining the consent from A and B every time an improvement was required? This statement he considered as a full reply to all that had been urged on this head, and he concluded with repeating his former wish that the bill might be speedily passed into a law.

Mr. CLARK.—When this bill was under consideration, some days past, I endeavored to show (and hope with satisfaction) that Congress had not the power of legislating on this subject. The ground I then assumed, was, that Virginia had, by contract with the State of Maryland, before the cession to the United States, acquired the right of highway on the river Potomac, which she has never granted. It is now unnecessary to inquire into the reasons of this policy; it is sufficient for our present purpose to say it is the fact.

In retracing this subject, I find my arguments very much strengthened by examining the Articles of Agreement between the States of Maryland and Virginia, and this circumstance is the only inducement for my troubling the Committee again. The sixth article of the Agreement declares that "the river Potomac shall be considered as a common highway for the purpose of navigation and commerce to the citizens of Virginia and Maryland, and of the United States, and all those in amity with them." The eighth article declares that "all laws and regulations which may be necessary for preserving and keeping open the channel and navigation of the river shall be made with the mutual consent and approbation of both States." If a doubt remained, therefore, it appears to me this must remove it, and time will be spent in vain to illustrate the subject.

My colleague (Mr. LEWIS) supposes, that as the two States have ceded the territory, all that either or both possessed passed by the grant; but let it be recollected this was a several and not a joint conveyance, and nothing more passed than is embraced by the terms of the grant; and Virginia has expressly limited it to her territory, and cautiously avoids yielding any right she had acquired from the State of Maryland. Here, Mr. Chairman, they distinguish between what they call an improvement and an obstruction of the navigation—the one they contend they have the right to do, but the other they have no power over. This admission, in my conception, surrenders the question; for, if we have the power of legislating on the subject, we can make any regulations we please, and indiscriminately improve, alter, or construct. It seems a little remarkable that gentlemen wish to improve a property they have no title to; and it does not appear a conspicuous mark of understanding to begin at the wrong end to improve, and then contend about the right.

Mr. NELSON did not expect that this point would have been brought up again, but since it had so happened, he felt a propriety, not to say a duty, in recapitulating also what he had urged before, and adding some further reasons to show that Congress had the right, and exclusive right, of jurisdiction over all that part of the river Potomac within the District of Columbia. The burden of the song appears to be this: that because the States of Maryland and Virginia entered into compact before the formation of the present Constitution, by which it was agreed that the river should be considered a common highway, and as both possessed the right of way, it was a joint right, which, as they did not jointly convey the right, has never been ceded to the United States. Does the gentleman (Mr. CLARK) mean to say that the States of Virginia and Maryland had not the power of granting this joint right? If he does not assert this, or if he admits they had the power, we shall be able to demonstrate that they have granted it to Congress. After two States have made a division of a part of each of their particular property, cannot they mutually give to another the property they have thus acquired? Surely common sense cannot deny them the right so to do: if you cannot grant away a right, it is no right, for a right cannot be complete if it cannot be conveyed to another; the very idea of a right implies the power of disposal. They say that Maryland had the exclusive right of navigating the river Potomac, and that she gave by compact a qualified property in that exclusive right to Virginia. Cannot Virginia convey this qualified right? If one holds a right to an estate for life or a term of years, is it not as competent for the party to convey such right, as it would be to convey an estate in fee simple? Whether the right be a special right, or a limited right, or of whatever nature it be, every man has a right to convey it to another, unless there be exceptions or reservations; but in the compact between Maryland and Virginia there are no reservations or stipulations that abridge or preclude a conveyance. Then he asked them to propound this case: Maryland has a common right with Virginia in the Potomac, and Maryland declares that she gives up all her right to ten miles square of her territory—the Potomac is a part—Virginia also says that, so far as she has a right, she gives it up also. Well, then, both States have given up their respective rights. Does not the relinquishment of their rights by both States produce the same effect as if it had been done by a joint instrument? Maryland, he asserted, had given up her right; no matter whether it was a real right or qualified right, she gave up all but what she had conveyed to Virginia, and Virginia has given up all she possessed.

Mark the reverse—if Virginia has not ceded her right in the Potomac, and Maryland hers, to Congress, then this is not a district of territory within the meaning of the Constitution; and if it be not the Constitutional district, we have no right to exercise any other jurisdiction here than what we exercise in common for every other part of the United States. For, if the District be separated by the Potomac, it is not one district, but two districts, and the Constitution does not give Congress power to assume exclusive jurisdiction over two districts. If, however, the State of Maryland has ceded the Potomac, and it runs up to the Virginia territorial line, then the district is but one district, though it consists of parts taken from two States. He felt a difficulty in defining this idea, because, when a thing is self-evident, it renders it hard to prove what is so palpable, and a multitude of words rather tend to confuse than clear the point. But what he understood was, that when several tracts of land were joined altogether, they are not separated by the water courses or anything else crossing or traversing the same; then the jurisdiction of Congress runs as well upon the bed of the river as its banks, and so over the whole ten miles square; if this idea was correct, Congress had assumed the exclusive jurisdiction over no more territory than they had a Constitutional right to acquire. He might be mistaken in his opinion; he therefore urged his arguments with great diffidence. He was liable to error, and that very often; and it may be the case in the present instance. But he must acknowledge that he had not as yet heard anything that satisfied his mind that he had been wrong. He therefore still hoped that the bill might pass into a law, from conviction that it would be a great benefit to all persons residing upon or near the waters of the Potomac.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH had hoped that the very perspicuous statement of his colleague (Mr. CLARK) when the subject was last under consideration, had satisfied the most incredulous that Congress were not competent to pass the bill before them. Indeed, he had hoped that the bill would have been suffered to sleep through the rest of the session, and the House no more troubled on the subject. The reasoning of the gentleman last up was to his mind utterly fallacious and inconclusive. The district was not necessarily divided into two bodies politic, because of the intervening jurisdiction of Virginia over the Potomac. Did Massachusetts constitute two States, because its parts were completely separated by New Hampshire through which you must necessarily pass to get into Maine from old Massachusetts, as it was called? For the purpose of division the mathematical line which marked the boundary between the two States of Maryland and Virginia was equivalent to the whole breadth of the Potomac. On the ground of natural right, Congress could not obstruct the navigation of the river. They could not do it without admitting the right of Virginia and Maryland to raise obstructions above and below. Those States had as good a claim to stop the passage of ships of the United States as Congress had to interrupt their batteaux. But gentlemen say they are not stopping the navigation, they are improving it. How? by damming up the best channel. Did not this justify any species of obstruction? It was only to term it an improvement, and every objection was silenced. Whatever might be the decision of the House, he trusted no member from Virginia would be found to concede her right over the Potomac. He hoped also that the subject would be suffered to remain at rest until the question of recession was decided; but, in whatever shape it should appear, he should always protest against it, as a violation of the rights of the State which he represented.

Mr. NELSON would briefly reply to what had been said in relation to two districts being but one district. The fact was, as had been often stated, that two parts of the District had been separately granted by Maryland and Virginia; that, if these two parts touched each other and left no interval, they became one district; but if there was an interval between them, such as the river Potomac, they were two districts, and over two districts Congress had no authority to assume exclusive jurisdiction. But he thought the gentleman from Virginia had evaded an answer to the position that Congress cannot exercise powers of exclusive legislation over two districts. What had been said of Massachusetts and Maine being one State, although separated from each other by New Hampshire, did not apply; they might be, and in fact were, a body politic, notwithstanding the geographical separation of the parts. A nation and its territory, like the United States and Louisiana, were a body politic, but the decision of the present question does not depend on things like these. The jurisdiction given to Congress by the Constitution over one district of country can never be considered a jurisdiction over two separate districts. True, if both parts join together, they are but one district; yet, if they are separate, they are two districts.

What has been said of Virginia's holding the right of free navigation under the law of nature and of nations was an opinion different from that he held; but it would take such a length of time to discuss that point, and recite his authorities, that he was induced to give it the go-by, with one single remark. It was not the understanding which the States of Virginia and Maryland had at the time of entering into the compact for the free navigation of the Potomac, Pocomoke, and the mouth of the Chesapeake bay. By that instrument, it would appear that their right of navigating these waters was the result of compact, and did not grow out of the law of nature, or the code adopted by the nations of Europe.

But suppose his ideas not to be correct, still he would contend that what was proposed to be done by the inhabitants of Georgetown was within the power of the United States Legislature, inasmuch as it goes to amend and make better the navigation of the Potomac. Indeed, any stranger standing by and hearing the debate which had taken place would suppose that the advocates for the dam were disposed to obstruct the navigation of the river in such a manner that no other vessels than those belonging to Georgetown should be permitted to pass by Mason's island. This, however, was by no means the intention. He concluded with observing, that, to him and his constituents, it was really a matter of great concern; and he believed it to be equally important to all the upper country of Maryland, and part of Virginia and Pennsylvania—all in Pennsylvania within twenty miles of the south line of that State, and all the inhabitants of Virginia between the ridge dividing the head-waters of Rappahannock and James rivers from the Potomac. If, by inaction or refusal, the channel to Georgetown should be suffered to fill up, he would not give a single farthing for all the improvements made upon the canal navigation. The Potomac Company may as well be abolished at once, for there will be an end to all the advantages they have heretofore calculated upon, and which had been the inducement for them to expend so many myriads of dollars on their improvements. He could not restrain himself from expressing his anxiety that the bill should pass, and this he still thought, as he had before declared, to be the proper time.

Mr. LUCAS.—The question is, whether we can authorize the inhabitants of Georgetown to improve the river at their own expense? And it appears, from the statements made in the course of the argument, that the Potomac was within the charter bounds of Maryland, and not within the charter bounds of Virginia; and unless Maryland had ceded the right of navigation thereon to Virginia by compact, Maryland would yet have been as the sole owner of the soil, also the sole owner of the river. What Maryland gave to Virginia was not a title to admit them to the right of ownership; they granted only a qualified right, and reserved the territorial right, and if so, Virginia has never possessed more than a qualified right. Let it be inquired, what right is that? and it will be found to be merely the right of free navigation. That is nothing more than the right of passage over the soil of another, or, as it is termed by the civilians, the right of servitude. It is not a right in the territory, but merely a right of usage across the soil. If, for example, an alluvion was to form an island in the Potomac, would Virginia claim it as joint owner of the soil? She would not, because she has no other claim than what is declared in the compact; that being only a qualified right, she is not joint owner; of course Maryland being the sole owner of the soil might convey her whole territorial right, subject only to the qualified right of Virginia, viz: the right of navigation. If the right of fishery, or any other territorial right, was contended for on her part, it would not be allowed her. For all territorial rights, as they were in Maryland from the beginning, remained in her till her act of cession.

It is evident, therefore, that Maryland, as absolute proprietor of the soil, could convey the same to Congress without the intervention of Virginia, and if Maryland could do this, she has done it; for, by her act of cession, she has ceded to Congress all her territorial rights over ten miles square, or less, of her State, but still subject to the qualified right of Virginia. It is urged that such a conveyance cannot be complete without the consent of Virginia, and as Virginia has not ceded her qualified right derived from Maryland, Congress do not hold the Potomac in full sovereignty. He granted it, and admitted further that as Virginia had only ceded such of her territory as was within her charter bounds, and as the right she had to the river was not included in her charter, but derived from Maryland by compact, that she still had that right; but that was a right neither more nor less than that of the free navigation to which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH) had said the State of Virginia was entitled by the law of nature and of nations, inasmuch as she held territory above and below. But if Maryland has conveyed to Congress all her right to that part of the Potomac lying within the boundaries of the District, Congress has the same right which Maryland had. Suppose a case: A person conveys his right of soil to another, but, previously, he had agreed with his adjoining neighbor to let him have the service of his road. Shall this qualified right in the use of the road across the other's soil, prevent the new possessor from repairing or improving such road? Such a position cannot be supported, because a general right of improvement in the owner of the soil would be counteracted by the special right of way or passage granted to another. Can it be said that Congress, when they wish to improve a road or a river within their exclusive jurisdiction, cannot exercise this right without the consent of those whom they have allowed to travel along or over the same? Surely this will not be contended for.

The waters of the Potomac are a common highway. We grant it; but will it cease to be a common highway, while the whole body of the waters are carried through one channel instead of two? Does the contraction of the surface and deepening of the channel render it less a highway than it was heretofore? Will the river Potomac cease to be the Potomac, when its waters are comprised within narrower bounds? No. What is lost in surface is gained in depth, not a drop is lost to the river, but there is a clear profit in the gain.

Allusion has been made to the navigation of the Mississippi, in which France has a qualified right of navigation—the United States owning the soil on both sides. If the United States should pass a law to remove its obstructions or cut across from point to point, would France interfere, and say you shall not remove a single stick of driftwood, or any of the masses of trees which almost choke up the navigation at certain seasons? It is preposterous to think so. What! not remove a bar that shall be formed by the course of nature? It is absurd. But there is more ground for this position than the one now advocated for the concurrent jurisdiction of Virginia. It has been contended that the States of Maryland and Virginia were to make the improvements in this river, not only by joint consent, but at joint expense. Now, would Georgetown, at her own expense, offer to lay out such a sum of money as is likely to be required for the erection of the dam in order to obstruct the navigation of the river—a river in which she is most deeply concerned? Would they pay the whole expense if it was to work an injury instead of a benefit? The States of Virginia and Maryland agreed, in the opening of the canal, but here Georgetown bears the whole expense; and let any man say whether they would contrive and pay for their own ruin?

Mr. SLOAN would leave the dispute, as to the right of jurisdiction over the river, to be settled by those who were more competent to investigate law questions than he was himself. But, from what he had heard, he had brought his mind to this conclusion, that, whatever right Maryland possessed to the jurisdiction of the Potomac, Congress was now entitled to exercise. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. J. RANDOLPH) has said that Congress has no right to obstruct the navigation. True; but it does not follow that Congress has no right to remove obstructions. He says, also, that we might stop both branches. Not so; it is intended to stop one only, in order to deepen the other, so as to render the navigation more useful and safe. The case before us has been occasioned by the act of God, or a great movement in nature; a great quantity of ice has been lodged, and tore up from the shore and the island the materials that form, perhaps, the base of this sand bar, by which the navigation has been obstructed. Now, suppose another case, that this ice had pent up the whole body of the river, and compelled the waters to form themselves a channel for escape through the lower grounds of the Virginia side, and thereby have given a new course to the river; and it would not be the first time that ice had been the cause of changing the bed of a river. He would ask, was there any member of this House but would heartily concur in restoring the inhabitants on this side the river to the use of the river, by erecting proper works to restore the stream to its old bed? He did not believe there would be the slightest objection to such a proposition, especially if it was to be done, like the present measure, at the sole expense of the people of Georgetown. With regard to the doubt which had been entertained whether it would be advantageous or not, he believed that to be perfectly settled, after what had been stated by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. LEWIS.) He believed it would no more injure Alexandria, or the mouth of the Eastern branch, than it would the mouth of the Chesapeake.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD.—This question has assumed several important aspects since it has been before the Committee. The first, though not the least, has been the denial of the right of Congress to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over this District of ten miles square. This question, however, must be solved by adverting to the Constitution of the United States, and the acts of cession of the States of Maryland and Virginia, which were passed for the purpose of carrying into execution that part of the Constitution relative to a territory over which the United States were to exercise exclusive legislation. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. J. RANDOLPH) has stated in fact, though not in words, that Congress have the power of assuming the exclusive jurisdiction over more than one district, if granted by any of the States. He says that this District of ten miles square is divided into two districts by the Potomac, or by a mathematical line, therefore, they are still two districts, and it does not deny the right of Congress to assume the exclusive legislation over them, but merely they have no right to exercise jurisdiction on the interval between them; this he has illustrated by a reference to old Massachusetts and her province of Maine. He says they are one body politic, and constitute one State of the Union. Here, that gentleman must surely be mistaken. It is not to be disputed that a State may consist of separated parts, and so might the territory of ten miles square, if the Constitution had not tied it down to one entire and connected district. As well might it be pretended that Congress might assume one hundred districts, each consisting of one mile square, as that they are authorized to hold two districts within their ten miles square. But the truth is, that, by the acts of cession both of Maryland and Virginia, the two parts which Congress have assumed are expressly granted, and Congress now stand on their ground, and have all the rights and jurisdiction which either or both States possessed previous to the act of cession, and that right extends over the river included in the ten miles square. He would admit, for argument sake, that those two States have the privilege of free navigation, or the right of highway; but he would ask, if there was anything contained in the bill that infringed that right? And he knew the answer must be that there was nothing in the bill likely to work an injury to any person.

Mr. ALSTON did not intend to consume much of the time of the Committee in delivering his sentiments, as the discussion had already been protracted to a much greater length than he, at the first view of the subject, supposed it merited. It has been contended by several gentlemen that Congress have no power to legislate at all upon the subject of the navigation of the river Potomac. This really, to him, appeared to be a very extraordinary doctrine indeed. That because Virginia and Maryland had not jointly conveyed a common property, their conveyances separate, although including this very common property, was not obligatory, and did not convey to Congress exclusive legislation and jurisdiction over such part of the river as lay within the District of Columbia. He admitted that the river Potomac was a common highway, and ought ever to remain so, for the benefit not only of the people of Virginia and Maryland, but likewise for all the citizens of the United States choosing to navigate the same; and to do any act whereby the navigation would, in the slightest degree whatever, be obstructed, was more than we had a right or ought to do. But would it follow, in consequence, that we had no right to improve or benefit the navigation of the river? Most indubitably not. It was, in his mind, clear, from the information he had received, that, unless something was done for the benefit of the navigation of the river, that an end would soon be put to Georgetown as a commercial spot. He believed it to be universally the case that the uniting of any two streams of nearly equal size produced a bar or shallow place just below their junction. If, then, the bar complained of, just below Mason's island, has been produced in consequence of the uniting of the two arms of the river, it seemed to him an inevitable consequence that, if one of them was dammed up, the channel would return to its former depth. Mr. A. could not see the force of an argument made use of by his colleague, the honorable Speaker, if he understood him correctly, to say that, if the dam contemplated should be effected, it would tend to injure the ferries established on the river. In what manner the erecting the dam from Mason's island to the Virginia shore could affect them, he was not able to discover, as the land on the Virginia shore, opposite the ferries, and the island, belong to the same person. He entertained no doubt but that the same privileges would extend to the island as were now enjoyed at the landing on the Virginia shore.

It, therefore, appeared to him that the propriety or impropriety of the measure contemplated by the bill upon the table, turned wholly upon the question, whether thereby the navigation of the river Potomac would be obstructed or benefited? For his part, he had no doubt but that it would greatly tend to the improvement of the navigation of the river. He should, therefore, give it his decided support, and hoped the bill would pass into a law.

Mr. CLAIBORNE asked if the ten miles square, located and surveyed to the United States, included the river? He rather suspected that they had laid off ten miles square, exclusive of the river. If this were the case, Congress had assumed jurisdiction over more territory than they were constitutionally entitled to.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH had really hoped that, after this question had been so long before the Committee, it would have been better understood than it appeared to be. He regretted his incompetency to make himself intelligible. He had not meant to convey the idea attributed to him by Mr. R. GRISWOLD. What he had said in relation to the two districts was offered as a solution of the difficulties which the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NELSON) seemed to labor under. He never did contend that, because Congress had the power of exercising exclusive jurisdiction over a district of ten miles square, they had, therefore, the right to exercise similar authority over one hundred districts of one mile square. The same gentleman seemed to labor under another error in supposing that he contended that Congress, because they had no right to legislate over the river, had no right to legislate here. The right of jurisdiction over the territory is not impugned by a denial of the right over the river. It is a little remarkable that the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. R. GRISWOLD) and the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. LUCAS) draw the same conclusion from different premises; but it never was contended by him, that Virginia had a territorial right over this river. What she had was a stipulated right, and Maryland had conceded that no obstruction should be made in the river, but by the consent of the two States. It is, however, said, that the dam will not be an obstruction, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania has discovered that all the water will still flow between the banks of the Potomac; but though the water be there, there will be no navigating up or down the west side of the island. The gentleman is also at a loss to conceive how Georgetown, which is so greatly interested in the navigation of the Potomac, should, at its own expense, undertake to throw obstructions in the river. Is he yet to learn that Georgetown might not be greatly concerned, if she hindered the navigation generally, while she derived much benefit to herself? He knows that there is a project afloat for cutting a canal across from the Potomac to the Eastern Branch, and by that means obstruct the passage to Alexandria. If you undertake to exercise this right, what is to prevent your taking the water out at the Little Fall, and bringing the whole to the residence of your favorite child, the City of Washington, and thereby destroy the canal constructed at such vast expense by the joint funds of Maryland and Virginia? He thought the present to be a very important question, or he would not have been so troublesome. He would just review the positions he had taken. The State of Virginia acquired by compact an extension of her natural right to the navigation of the Potomac; she afterwards ceded ten miles square within her limits; but did not cede any qualified right she might have beyond her limits; yet you assume this power, and deprive Virginia of what she alleges she neither did nor ever meant to convey. He hoped, whatever might be the decision, that not a single member from Virginia would vote to yield up her rights without her consent.

Mr. J. LEWIS.—My colleague has expressed a hope that no member from Virginia would be found to sanction a measure so hostile to the rights of that State. I lament extremely that I should, upon any occasion, differ in sentiment with that gentleman, and particularly upon this; but, because I am so unfortunate as not to agree with my colleague upon this question, I hope I shall not, on that account, be charged with an abandonment of the interests of Virginia. I am as tenacious of her rights as my honorable colleague, or any other Representative from that State, and I must, at the same time, be permitted to express my regret that any member from Virginia shall be found to oppose a measure so very interesting to a large portion of the citizens of that State.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL, considering an important principle involved, would offer a few remarks on the point in question, namely, whether Virginia did really intend to cede to the United States any right of jurisdiction which she possessed over the Potomac, and if she did mean to cede, whether the law passed by her is couched in such terms as to convey that right?

The principal objection relied upon is, that the right which Virginia had was nothing more than a use springing out of the real property, without any territorial right; yet he understood that both the States of Maryland and Virginia could send their civil officers to execute process upon the Potomac. This being admitted, the inevitable conclusion is that the river was within the jurisdiction of Virginia for such purpose. Now look into the law, and see whether the terms be not broad enough to cover the jurisdiction claimed by Congress; the words are, that she cedes a tract of country not exceeding ten miles square, &c., and that Congress may exercise exclusive jurisdiction over the soil and the persons residing thereon. From these words it is clear, that Virginia meant to convey everything she possessed in relation to the soil. He believed that a person might use expressions in a deed that conveyed more than he possessed. Although the object did not pass, yet it was, pro tanto, good for as much as he did possess, which was the case with Virginia. He concluded by observing that it was singular so much danger should be apprehended, and yet no person came before them to complain; there were no petitions either from Alexandria or the Eastern Branch, nor did he apprehend there would be any, as he believed that deepening the channel would be a general good, and not produce even a partial injury.

Mr. MACON.—Although it may be a good rule, yet it is not a general one, that people are well satisfied when they do not complain; yet gentlemen, when they are sent here to legislate, must exercise their own judgment on the probable consequences. If all the people of the District were to say that this was a proper measure, he should still exercise his own opinion. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. LEWIS) had narrated the history of this river, and informed us there was no impediment prior to 1784. He did not doubt the correctness of the statement; but he should have gone further, and informed us what was the population on the waters of the Potomac at that time, and what it is at present, and likely hereafter to be; because if such a mud bank was raised in the river when its banks had little or no cultivation, what was it likely to be when thickly settled, for every new farm and every additional cultivation, loosened the earth, which was swept away by every fresh, and the mud bank at the head of tide water would proportionably increase in magnitude.* Such had been the case with the Rappahannock, and if it should turn out that these two rivers are in a similar situation, their trouble would be thrown away.

Mr. HOLLAND admitted that the quantity of mud would increase by cultivation; but if the channel is deepened by narrowing the river, the mud would descend lower, and deposit itself in that part of the bed of the river where the channel was deeper. He had no doubt of the right of Congress to the exclusive legislation over the river, as well as over every other part of the District. He should therefore vote for the bill, believing that they had the right, and that the measure would be greatly beneficial to the commerce of the country.

On the question being about to be put, Mr. EPPES requested the Clerk to read the eighth article of the compact between Maryland and Virginia, which being done,

The question on striking out the first section was put and lost—forty members voting in the affirmative, and seventy-two against it.

Mr. LYON proposed a new section incorporating a company to build a bridge over the Potomac. He thought the two objects ought to go together, and unless they were connected, he should not vote for the bill.

The CHAIRMAN determined the motion not in order, the Committee having had nothing relative to a bridge referred to them. The amendment, however, would be proper in the House.

The Committee then rose and reported, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 12.

Another member, to wit: BENJAMIN HUGER, from South Carolina, appeared and took his seat in the House.

Two memorials of sundry inhabitants of the counties of Randolph and St. Clair, in the Indiana Territory of the United States, in behalf of themselves and other inhabitants of the said Indiana Territory, were presented to the House and read, respectively praying that they may be permitted to purchase public lands, the property of the United States within the said Territory, at a less price than that fixed by an act passed at the last session of Congress for the disposal of the said public lands, and that the right of pre-emption may be granted to the memorialists and other actual settlers thereon.—Referred to Mr. LYON, Mr. MORROW, Mr. GRAY, Mr. HOGE, and Mr. CUTTS, to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. VARNUM, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for establishing rules and regulations for the government of the Armies of the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS, the unfinished business of yesterday, on the bill relating to the dam or causeway to be erected across the Potomac, from Mason's island to the Virginia shore, was considered by the House, and after some attempts to modify the bill, all of which proved unsuccessful, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. THOMAS called for the order of the day on the report on the petition from the New York and Dutchess counties slate companies, recommending a resolution that it is not expedient at this time to increase the duties on slate.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the report.

Mr. THOMAS moved the Committee of the Whole to concur in the report of the select committee, which was agreed to without a division. The Committee then rose and reported its concurrence, and the resolution was thereupon adopted by the House.

Mr. STANFORD would have called up the resolutions for the recession of the Territory of Columbia to the States of Virginia and Maryland; but on account of the absence (as he understood, occasioned by indisposition) of two or three gentlemen who feel interested in the decision; but he gave notice, that he should call it up when he saw them in their places, which he hoped would be to-morrow.

Mr. JACKSON called up the order of the day on the bill making application of the moneys heretofore appropriated by law for making a post road from the navigable waters of the Atlantic to the Ohio river.

Mr. EPPES stated that the Senate had a bill on the same subject at this moment before them, and that too in the same form.

Mr. JACKSON withdrew his call.

ARMED MERCHANT VESSELS.

Mr. JACKSON called for the order of the day on the bill relative to the clearance of armed merchant vessels, if gentlemen were prepared to consider the same. He thought a law on this subject should be enacted as speedily as possible, for a number of merchants in our seaports had embarked extensively in an illicit commerce, which he conceived dangerous to our peace and national honor.

Mr. J. CLAY requested that the bill might be suffered to lie until the memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of Philadelphia was printed, which had been ordered a few days since.

Mr. JACKSON did not know of this memorial, or of an order for printing. If the business could be understood on its being read to the House by the Clerk, he should incline to consider the bill. He wished, however, the House to decide on the postponement.

Mr. EUSTIS wished the bill to lie on the table.

A question was taken for postponing till to-morrow, and carried—seventy-two voting in favor of the motion.

The House adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 13.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from John Gregory, a black man, alleging himself to be a native of Nansemond county, in the State of Virginia, dated on board of the British ship of war, called the Alcmene, the nineteenth of August, in the present year, stating, that having lost his protection, and being shipwrecked in the British Channel, he has been impressed on board the said Alcmene, and detained there against his inclination; and praying that Congress will be pleased to take his case into consideration, and obtain his discharge from the British service.

The said letter was read, and, together with a certificate of the Consul and Agent of the United States at London, accompanying the same, ordered to be referred to the Secretary of State for information.

POTOMAC RIVER.

On the third reading of the bill for the erection of a dam or causeway from Mason's island to the western shore of the Potomac, the yeas and nays were called for by Mr. VARNUM.

Mr. DAWSON said: My absence from this House for some days past, occasioned by my bad health, has prevented my hearing the arguments which have been urged in favor of this bill, as well as those in opposition to it; presuming, however, that they had much affinity to those which were urged on its introduction, which, in my judgment, were conclusive in opposition and feeble in support, I must be permitted to express my astonishment that it has progressed so far, and that this House must now decide on its passage or rejection.

In this stage of the business, and under existing circumstances, I should not intrude a single observation, especially as I learn that the subject has been fully discussed, and various votes taken, did I not feel impelled by one consideration superior to all others; but, sir, whenever a proposition is made which goes to affect the interest and wantonly violates the rights of a State, one of whose Representatives I am, I hold it to be my bounden duty to rise in the opposition. Such is the bill in your hands, and under such influence do I now act. In my judgment, that bill usurps a power, and attempts the exercise of a right, which the States of Maryland and Virginia never have, and I trust never will, relinquish to any Government—a right essential to them as sovereign States, and the relinquishment of which will render them dependencies not only on the General Government, but upon any Corporation within the District of Columbia.

In the course of this discussion, reference, no doubt, has been had to the deeds of cession from those two States to the General Government; I mean not again to bring them to their view, and mention them only for one purpose. I presume that in the construction of those articles, the same rules will be observed, the same principles will be adhered to, which are observed in the construction of the original compact, the Constitution. I well know that in the construction of that instrument, two opinions have gone abroad in the United States, and have their zealous advocates: the one is, that the General Government possesses all powers which it shall deem necessary, and which are not expressly reserved to the States; to this doctrine I have never been a friend, and am surprised to find that it has so many advocates on this day who support that bill; the other is, "that 'all rights, powers, and jurisdictions, are reserved' to the States, which are not expressly delegated to the General Government." This is the doctrine which I have always advocated, and which

I support on this day by opposing that bill. Admitting, sir, my first position to be true—that the same rules of construction must be used in the two cases which I have mentioned, I call upon gentlemen to show any express surrender of this right of jurisdiction, either by the State of Maryland or that of Virginia. None appears, and gentlemen must either adopt the extensive doctrine of implication as one of their political tenets, or relinquish that bill. I will go further, sir, and declare it as my opinion, that the Legislatures of those two States never could have intended the surrender of that jurisdiction. I was a member of the Legislature of Virginia at that time, and the idea was new to me until the last year, when the bridge proposition was brought forward. I appeal to the candor of the gentlemen of this Committee, and call upon them to say whether it is reasonable to suppose that those two States, after taking uncommon pains to fix, and render secure forever, to themselves and their friends, the navigation of this river; after uniting their efforts to open and improve it to a considerable distance above tidewater, would surrender the jurisdiction to any earthly power, thereby putting it in their power to impede it whenever they please? for, be it remembered, that if we have a right to throw up a dam in one place, we have a right to build a bridge in another; if to build a bridge, to draw an artificial line at any place, saying, "thus far you shall go, and no further."

For these reasons, I am convinced that the right has never been surrendered; that it never was intended; and that it never ought to be relinquished. Considering the objections which I have mentioned as sufficient to defeat the bill, I have forborne to examine into its expediency; whether it will prove advantageous to some of the District and injurious to others, I will not pretend to say. One thing, however, appears probable to me, that if, by the erection of this dam, the rapidity of the water opposite to Georgetown is increased, and thereby the sand and mud carried to a lower point and there deposited, that point may be at or near the Eastern Branch, which we have established as our navy yard, to which heavy vessels get with great difficulty, and from which they may be entirely excluded, should the effect which I apprehend take place. I submit this to the consideration of the friends of this establishment, which is not without its enemies already.

One more word and I am done. If we admit the right to erect a dam, we have the same to build a bridge; and if we grant the one for the accommodation of one part of the people of the District, I know not how we can refuse the other to the inhabitants of the other part. Let the friends of the present bill look to this; the division of this House on the last year on that point was very equal, and the admission of the right will certainly give it new friends.

On the passage of the bill the yeas and nays were taken, and are as follows:

ARMED MERCHANT VESSELS.

The consideration of the bill to regulate the clearance of armed merchant vessels was resumed. The bill as amended was read, as follows:

A Bill to regulate the clearance of armed merchant vessels.

Be it enacted, &c., That, after due notice of this act at the several custom-houses, no merchant vessel, armed, or provided with the means of being armed at sea, shall receive a clearance, or be permitted to leave the ports where she may be so armed or provided, without bond, with two sufficient sureties, being given by the owner or owners, or by the master or commander, to the use of the United States, in a sum equal to double the value of said vessel, conditioned that such vessel shall not make or commit any depredation, outrage, unlawful assault, or violence, nor make any other unlawful use of her arms against the vessels, citizens, subjects, or territory of any nation in amity with the United States; Provided, That the regulations herein contained shall not be construed to extend to vessels bound to any port or place in the Mediterranean, or beyond the Cape of Good Hope.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, if any armed merchant vessel, clearing for any port or place within the Mediterranean or beyond the Cape of Good Hope, shall make or commit any depredations, outrage, unlawful assault, or violence as aforesaid, on her voyage to or from any place to which she may be bound or elsewhere, or shall wilfully proceed to any port or place in the West Indies, such vessel with her arms, tackle, and furniture, or the value thereof, shall be forfeited to the use of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, on satisfactory evidence or information being given to the collector of any port, that any vessel within the same is armed or arming, or provided with the means of being armed at sea, for the purpose of committing any unlawful act, as hereinbefore expressed, or of carrying on by force of arms any unlawful commerce, it shall be the duty of such collector to claim such vessels, until the case be submitted to the President of the United States, who is hereby authorized to cause such vessel to be disarmed, or to order a clearance to be granted, as he shall judge proper.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any armed vessel as aforesaid, shall proceed to sea without a clearance, or shall leave the port, where her detention or disarming shall be required, contrary to the provision of this act, such vessel, with her arms, furniture, and tackle, or the value thereof, shall be forfeited to the use of the United States.

MR. CROWNINSHIELD moved to strike out the proviso to the first section, which declared that the regulations contained in the bill should not be construed to extend to vessels bound to the Mediterranean, or beyond the Cape of Good Hope.

MR. EPPES observed, there were only two cases in which nations usually allowed their merchant vessels to arm; the one, when a nation is at war, when she willingly takes advantage of the aid furnished by her subjects in arming private vessels of war or letters of marque. The other, when the trade is so remote and the seas so dangerous to peaceable navigators, that each vessel must be qualified to defend itself, as the nation can neither furnish convoys nor establish a force for their protection. He considered the latter case to be provided for by the proviso, and it was to him the most unexceptionable part of the bill. He did not approve of allowing merchant vessels to arm at all. He therefore would move to strike out all that part of the section which went to allow a clearance upon giving bond not to commit depredations on the vessels or subjects of nations in amity with the United States; and so on, to the end of the section. As this included the words intended by MR. CROWNINSHIELD to be struck out, he presumed his motion would therefore supersede that made by that gentleman; and after the words were struck out, he meant to insert after the words, "shall receive" "at any custom-house of the United States any clearance, or be permitted to leave the port where she shall be so armed and provided, unless bound to the Mediterranean, or beyond the Cape of Good Hope."

In passing the first section of the bill in the way it now stood, he was convinced that we adopted a principle almost, if not entirely unknown to maritime jurisprudence, and such as would without great caution involve the United States in a foreign war. He did not think that circumstances required the adoption of that principle at this time. The following passage in the President's Message he suspected gave rise to the present measure:

"While noticing the irregularities committed on the ocean by others, those on our part should 'not be omitted, nor left unprovided for. Complaints have been received that persons, residing within the United States, have taken on themselves to arm merchant vessels, and to force a commerce into certain ports and countries, in defiance of the laws of those countries. That individuals should undertake to wage private war, independently of the authority of their country, cannot be admitted in a well ordered society. Its tendency to produce aggression on the laws and rights of other nations, and to endanger the peace of our own, is so obvious, that I doubt not you will adopt measures for restraining it effectually in future."

These are the evils we are called upon to correct; but let him ask whether the remedy was of a nature to cure the disease? What! Shall it be permitted to every man, who can execute a bond, to wield the arms of the nation? Yet this is the only circumstance required to make a commander of an armed merchant vessel, and this too in time of profound peace. The evil complained of by the President, was that our merchants have taken upon themselves to arm and force a commerce. The obvious remedy is to take away their arms, for then the evil can no longer exist. It is much more easy and more politic to prevent the injury being committed, than to punish the party for the offence.

We are informed that armed vessels sailing to the West Indies are sold, with their arms and ammunition, to a class of people it is the interest of the United States to depress and keep down, rather than put arms in their hands, to do such extensive mischief as is every day practised in that island; to say nothing of the feelings such conduct on the part of our citizens, or people among us assuming that character, might have on the Government of France.

Mr. LOWNDES wished the gentlemen who made the report would give the committee some information of the ground upon which they had bottomed the bill. When the President's Message was received, he had supposed that the French Minister had remonstrated against this commerce, and that something was required to be done to restrain the trade to St. Domingo. If that is the design, it will not be answered by the bill in its present form. You here authorize your merchant vessels to arm, on giving bond and sureties; bond to do what? Why, conditioned that such vessels shall not commit depredation, outrage, or violence, against the vessels or persons of nations in amity with the United States. What is the fair inference from these words, but that you shall be competent to trade to St. Domingo in vessels armed or unarmed? If in an armed vessel, shall they refuse to be searched? Suppose they resist the search, what then? Do gentlemen mean to extend this law to Spanish vessels claiming a right to search? for Spain is likely soon to become a belligerent Power—if they do, how can we preserve a neutral position? He was willing to do as much to preserve the peace of the nation as any man. And should think it the best and fairest mode of proceeding, either to declare the trade to St. Domingo to be a lawful trade, and in that case protect commerce by a public force, or suffer the private shipping to defend themselves. Or say, that the trade to that island is unlawful, and interdict it at once, and altogether. Say, then, they shall not trade to any part of St. Domingo, (and this appears to be what the Message pointed at,) and you will effectually restrain them.

Mr. EUSTIS said, that depriving merchant vessels of the power of arming would be to deprive them of the capacity of trading to St. Domingo—not to St. Domingo alone, but to Cuba, and many other of the West India islands, as well as the Spanish Main; for the number of small picaroons, employed for the express purpose of capturing our neutral and defenceless ships, would render the seas too dangerous for our navigation. He trusted, however, that Congress would not abandon so advantageous and profitable a trade, as that to the West Indies, but on a full conviction that it would ultimately do more injury than benefit to the United States. It is well known, and the circumstances are too recent not to be in the recollection of every member, that during the last European war many millions of dollars were taken from our citizens by almost every one of the belligerent Powers having colonial possessions on this side of the Atlantic. A second time we are exposed to a similar injury, and he did not know how to avoid it without enabling our merchant vessels to arm and make effectual resistance to the small privateers which swarmed in those seas. He hoped that Congress would express their opinion on this point; for if the idea of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. EUSTIS) is to be acted upon, the business would have to be put into a different train, and would thereby render it unnecessary on the part of the select committee to give the information which had been requested.

He would, however, state the object of the bill. It must be very well known that in carrying on the trade with St. Domingo a great number of irregularities have taken place; that our vessels have supplied the natives with considerable quantities of articles contraband of war; they have taken away people from that island, whether subjects of France or others, contrary to the established rules and legal regulations of the place. These are circumstances it is desirable to avoid in future, and that can be best done by making a law for the regulation of this trade, and thereby secure to our country a very valuable commerce. Every gentleman knows there is great difficulty in restraining a trade where the profits are high, though attended with more risk and danger than ordinary. And he saw but two ways in which the thing could be done on the present occasion; which were, either to interdict the trade altogether, or pass the bill now on the table. The interdiction of the trade would be followed by a loss to this country, which existing circumstances did not call upon us to make. He was persuaded that our merchant vessels must arm in order to get to St. Domingo, or many of the West India islands; it is necessary for the safety of the vessel and the lives of the crew. Will a merchant vessel under this bill, being armed and cleared, having given proper security, proceed to sea? What is then required? They are to abstain from committing outrage, unlawful assault, or violence, upon our friends, nor make any other unlawful use of their arms. The clause is expressed generally and not minutely; the committee did not deem it necessary to go into a detail showing the nature and defining the species of every act of violence, assault, or outrage; the difficulty of such a detail would have discouraged the attempt had it even been required. The Government will be equally secure against these armed merchantmen, committing offences, under the general definition, as they would have been in any other mode; the vessels are subject to the general restriction contained in the first section of the bill, and this, he thought, would restrain them sufficiently. As for the rest of the bill, the second, third, and fourth sections, he did not consider them of importance, and he should move to strike them out.

Mr. J. CLAY expressed some surprise at Mr. EPPES's amendment, which went to restrain all merchant vessels from being armed, unless such as were bound to the Mediterranean, or beyond the Cape of Good Hope. This was saying nothing more than the laws already enacted declare. He supposes, too, that the peace of our country is to depend upon the honesty or villany of the commander of an armed merchant vessel. If gentlemen would investigate this subject, they would find that the peace of the country never had been, nor was ever likely to be, hazarded by our armed merchantmen, except in the single instance of forcing a trade to St. Domingo; there is no danger to be apprehended from our armed merchant vessels in any other country. The object of the bill is to preserve the peace of the country by laying a penalty to be incurred for every offence. The trade to the West Indies must either be suspended, or if carried on in unarmed vessels, it must be left to the plunder of a ferocious banditti, disguised under the French flag. Nor are these the only ones to be apprehended; the brigands of small force are lying in wait in every quarter; indeed it is not safe for our merchantmen to sail unarmed from our ports on the Atlantic to New Orleans. The depredations already made on our commerce had amounted to an immense sum; the insurance companies in Baltimore alone have lost $100,000; yet the commerce is too valuable to the United States to be abandoned altogether. But were America to suspend her intercourse with St. Domingo, the evil of having the present inhabitants for our neighbors would not be lessened; for, whilst the rich productions of that island are in such universal demand, they will find their way to market, and their want of military stores or contraband of war will be equally supplied to them, not by Americans, but by British vessels, from the Danish or other neutral islands; the trade will continue, and either neutral or belligerent nations will reap the benefit. To make the thing still more secure, he thought it would be as well that the commander should give bond and sureties for his conduct on board an armed vessel; and if the cargo were made liable to forfeiture as well as the vessel, he should deem it a sufficient security to prevent the misapplication of the power entrusted to the commander. He hoped the committee would reject the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES,) and afterwards concur in the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. EUSTIS.)

Mr. McCREERY.—Mr. Chairman: Whatever may be the fate of the bill now before you, I think it my duty to state to this committee some circumstances which induce me to think, that the information given to the Executive concerning the conduct of our merchant vessels has been much exaggerated.

I am aware that the liberty of trade granted us to that island has been much abused by some of our citizens, and it is my wish that such laws may pass as will effectually restrain and punish such proceedings.

It is well known, sir, that we have had a considerable share of the trade of St. Domingo for more than ten years past, except for a certain period of the late administration, when it was prohibited by our own Government; that under all the late legitimate governments of that island it was not only permitted but invited; that in consequence of this and of contracts made by the Generals Le Clerc and Rochambeau, with some of our citizens, for the supply of provisions and other necessities, there was American property to an immense amount in that island when evacuated by the last mentioned General, and, consequently, a considerable number of our citizens remained there. Under these circumstances it was not to be expected that this property and those men were to be abandoned. The trade was therefore continued in a peaceable manner, and would still have been carried on so, had it not been interrupted by vessels unlawfully armed in the ports of Cuba. Into these ports many of our vessels were carried, their cargoes landed in the night, the vessels sent out of the harbors, scuttled and sunk, to prevent detection, and the crews left without any means of returning to their own country. The question with our merchants then was, whether they were to abandon this trade altogether, and sacrifice their property remaining there, or arm their vessels for defence. The latter plan, and in my opinion the wisest, was adopted; and, I believe, not more than one instance has occurred where our vessels, thus armed, have resisted a legitimate force. To prove to the Committee that the vessels thus opposing our trade were not authorized, I request that the Clerk may be permitted to read the decree not long since issued by General Ferrand, at the port of St. Domingo.

[The decree was here read by the Clerk as follows:]

A Decree for re-establishing order in the Leeward Islands, for the issuing and use of letters of marque.

WE, L. FERRAND, General of Brigade, Commander-in-Chief of the Army of St. Domingo, Captain General pro. tem:

French corsairs, who have obtained limited letters of marque, whose time is expired, continue or renew their cruising, without having regard to any of the formalities required in such cases :

That others have obtained, of some pretended French agents, the term of their letters of marque to be prolonged :

That others are bearers of letters of marque, whose transfer has been made by these pretended agents over to other ships than those for which they had been delivered :

That others have purchased letters of marque of these pretended agents, who, abusing the confidence of the Captains-General, of whom they held their power, have permitted a commerce thus culpable, without even examining the morality of the men to whom these letters of marque have been sold :

That some navigate with letters of marque expedited by those Generals who, not being Captains-General, not exercising those functions, have no right to deliver them. Informed likewise that under pretence of being ignorant that the tribunals of St. Domingo are alone competent to decide on neutral prizes, in relation with the rebels of that island, without regard to the authority from which the letters of marque, with which the privateers are provided, issued, several owners and captains of corsairs have neglected to observe the formalities prescribed, the principle of which is to make known the literal contents of those letters which have been given them :

Considering, that to tolerate much longer the irregular conduct of the privateers and captains of corsairs, which are found in the different cases mentioned, there would incontestably result abuses which would cause privateering to degenerate into piracy, and dishonor the French flag :

DECREE.

ARTICLE 1. From the first of Vendemiaire, 13th year, all the letters of marque delivered by General Rochambeau, those delivered by the Generals formerly employed in the army of St. Domingo, likewise those issued by us until the present day, the 8th Thermidor, shall be null and without effect. The only letters of marque delivered by us from the present date, 8th Thermidor, and which shall be declared under our hand, that they shall be valid until such epoch, are not to be comprised in this repeal.

ART. 2. From the same day, the 1st Vendemiaire, 13th year, all the owners and captains carrying letters of marque of the French Captains-General, other than those of St. Domingo, which shall be in the case of having relation to Santo Domingo, whose courts are the only competent tribunals to judge of neutral ships taken in contravention on the coast of St. Domingo, as well as those arrested with clearances for the ports occupied by the rebels, or going out of those ports, shall be held to prove their powers in the original.

ART. 3. Those who should wish to arm for a cruise, or those having armed who should wish to continue cruising, will obtain from us letters of marque when they shall conform to the requisite formalities.

ART. 4. The Captains-General of the French Windward Islands shall be apprized of the abuses committed daily, in consequence of the cupidity of some owners or captains disposed to see every ship in contravention, whosoever they may meet neutral flags in sight, and even out of sight of the coast of St. Domingo ; and they shall be invited to put a stop to those abuses, to have returned the letters of marque confided to those men who have abused them ; they shall likewise be desired to recall those charged with their affairs, pretending to be French agents, who have given well-founded cause of complaint.

ART. 5. From the date of the 1st Vendemiaire, 13th year, the prizes that shall be made by owners and captains of French cruisers who have not conformed to the regulations contained in articles 1, 2, 3, of the present decree, shall be confiscated for the use of the invalid fund.

ART. 6. The pretended French agents who shall issue letters of marque, of which they may be in possession, or cause to be assigned those delivered by competent authority, shall be considered as forgers, and denounced as such to the Minister of the Marine and of the Colonies, and prosecuted with all the rigor of the law.

ART. 7. Copies of this decree shall be sent to the Minister of the Marine and the Colonies. They shall likewise be sent to the Governors of the neighboring colonies, to the Captains-General of the French Windward Islands, to the Minister of France near the United States of America, and likewise to the French agents in the Antilles. The present decree shall be printed, published, and posted up in the city of Santo Domingo, and likewise in all parts of the island of St. Domingo occupied by the French. It shall be registered in the Bureau of the Inspection of the Marine, likewise in the Register of the Provisional Commission of Justice, and also in the Special Commission of Prizes.

Headquarters at Santo Domingo, the 8th Thermidor, 13th year.

L. FERRAND.

And to give to the committee some idea of the extent of the lawless depredations committed on our commerce in those seas, I beg leave to state the losses sustained by the five insurance offices of Baltimore, not correctly stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. CLAY):

The Maryland office	-	-	-	$128,565
The Baltimore office	-	-	-	80,140
The Chesapeake office	-	-	-	67,455
The Union office	-	-	-	90,687
The Marine office	-	-	-	125,110

Making, in all, nearly $500,000, besides considerable property not insured—nearly all of which has been sold without any form of trial, and leaves our merchants without any hope of redress.

If this bill passes into a law, we shall in fact be deprived of the trade to all the leeward islands, and even that to New Orleans will not be safe. One vessel lately bound from Alexandria to Jamaica has been carried into Cuba, where her cargo was landed and sent in small vessels to Jamaica, by these picaroons. Another, from Baltimore to St. Jago de Cuba, was, on her homeward passage, with a cargo worth $40,000, taken by one of them, who had no commission, and was carrying his prize into Barracoa, when it was retaken by a British cruiser and sent to Jamaica ; and no later than last month, the vessel of a Baltimore merchant, who never armed a vessel, and who, I verily believe, was never concerned in any illicit trade, was obliged to put into the port of Savannah in distress, on her return from St. Domingo. On going up the river she was met by one of these freebooters, that had chased her on her voyage out; the captain of which declared he would make prize of this schooner, and waited off the river for that purpose.

I will not detain the Committee by reading documents to prove these statements, but will leave them on the Clerk's table for the perusal of any gentleman of the Committee who may choose to satisfy himself. I have been also informed, but I have no documents to prove it, that one of our vessels, bound from Liverpool to New Orleans, has been taken by one of these cruisers. On the whole, sir, as I consider our entire trade to the West Indies and to New Orleans implicated in this motion, I shall decidedly vote against it.

Mr. EPPES said that, notwithstanding the objections made to his proposed amendment, he sincerely believed the best interests of the nation required that it should prevail. It appeared to him that neither of the gentlemen who had opposed it had taken a correct view of the question. We are not, said he, passing a law for the protection of American commerce, but we are making provision against the improper use of arms; for it seems to be the intention of those gentlemen to allow our vessels to arm. They tell you that their vessels cannot do without arms; they cannot effect the object of their voyages without being prepared with a sufficient armament. Why, this is precisely the argument of a highwayman for the use of his pistols. But ought the United States to protect their commerce in this way? He thought they ought not. Do these gentlemen possess information that we cannot carry on our commerce without armed vessels? If so, it will bring up the whole principles upon which the right of armament is founded, and he trusted it would be manifested that the provisions of this or any other bill to be enacted for the purpose, would be such as to secure the United States from a collision with foreign Powers. He did not think it comported with the dignity of the Union to arm their merchant vessels and turn them loose upon the ocean, to act as whim, or caprice, or a thirst of lucre should dictate. It would be nothing more or less than covering the ocean with an armed banditti, that would bring down upon the United States the sovereign contempt and just indignation of all the Powers of Europe. He hoped the navigating and commercial character of Americans would be formed upon their superior skill and industry; if in the exercise of these, they were opposed, he was willing to extend the public protection to them; he would not only protect their rights in this way, but he would also avenge their wrongs. The arms of the Union can reach the Caribbean seas as well as the Mediterranean; and this, he presumed, was the course proper to be pursued. He felt extremely averse to the principle of the bill; he could not reconcile himself to do what no other nation had ever done: that is, give arms to every man sailing on the ocean who shall require it. Do you grant even letters of marque in this way? By no means. What! shall A, B, and C, persons we know nothing of, because they can sign a bond, with a security, range the ocean under the sanction of the flag of the Union, to make war upon other nations, and exercise a power which the Constitution declares shall be exercised exclusively by Congress? He did not believe the good sense of the Committee would permit them to confer the power of making war on any set of men, however virtuous or respectable, much less to commanders of armed merchant vessels, cruising in pursuit of wealth or plunder. No, they would certainly prefer to retain such an important power in their own hands; and he was well persuaded that the public peace would be preserved but a very short time after the moment that Congress put it in the power of others to make war. For whatever may be the character of a sea captain, if he executes his bond, he is entitled to his arms; and is any gentleman weak enough to believe that a bond to the amount of the value of the vessel will restrain an intemperate person from using arms when he is irritated by an anticipated detention or scrutinizing overhaul? It is well known, even in civil life on shore, where every man is equal, how difficult it is to restrain the vindictive passions of hasty tempers. The difficulty was much greater at sea. He really thought the risk too great to be entrusted to this body of men. He was, however, willing to protect them in every lawful commercial pursuit, as far as the arm of the Union could reach. But he would not consent to put the national vengeance in the hands of any man or set of men, with whose characters he was unacquainted, and who, for all he knew or appeared to be required by the bill, might be totally regardless of all the ties of virtue, justice, and national honor.

The question on Mr. EPPES's amendment was taken—40 voting in the affirmative and 61 in the negative; the motion was lost.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD moved to strike out the proviso and the second section.

Mr. J. C. SMITH conceived the motion out of order; the proviso belonged to the first section, and that was the section under consideration; the Committee had not as yet reached the second section.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD then proposed to strike out the proviso alone; which was agreed to by the Committee—55 against 32.

Mr. J. CLAY said that he did not think the bond of an owner or commander for the value of the vessel was sufficient. He therefore moved to forfeit also her tackle, apparel, furniture, and cargo. It was well known that in many voyages now making, the forfeiture of the vessel would be but a trifling loss, compared with the profits made upon some cargoes, and that merchants would cheerfully incur the penalty rather than decline a voyage whereon such great profits were to arise.

Mr. EVSRIS admitted in some cases that the penalty might not be too great; but there were others in which it would be out of all proportion. Instance an East Indiaman with a cargo of four or five hundred thousand dollars; he feared requiring sureties to such an amount would greatly interrupt that branch of commerce, if not totally prevent it.

DECEMBER, 1804.

H. OF R.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD objected to the insertion of the cargo, but had no objection to the tackle, apparel, and furniture being forfeited with the vessel.

Mr. J. CLAY.—The gentleman knows that the bond given in the case of East Indiamen is a mere formality; that trade being, on account of its profit, one in which there is no danger as to the improper conduct of the captain, men of respectability and good character always being employed; but the provision is intended to prevent illegal voyages, under an idea that the profit upon the cargo will more than cover the condition of the bond. He had no objection to exclude the cargoes of East Indiamen from the effect of this bond; but, in the case of West Indiamen, he thought Government would not have an adequate security unless the value of the cargo was made liable as well as the vessel.

Mr. GODDARD asked if it was intended to take two bonds, one of the owner and the other of the commander, and to be for double the value of the vessel and double the value of the cargo? In this event, the security would be quadruple. He would merely submit it to the consideration of gentlemen, whether it would be proper to embarrass commerce in this way.

Mr. J. CLAY.—That may be easily obviated by making it a joint bond.

The question on the amendment was taken and agreed to—66 against 32.

Mr. CLARK thought, while we were imposing penalties on our citizens, it would likewise be proper equally to restrain foreigners; he therefore moved an amendment, to insert after the American owners of the vessel, the words "or any person or persons resident within the United States." This would restrain aliens reaping the profits so frequently mentioned.—Agreed to.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD moved to add the following: "Provided, that the regulations herein contained shall not be construed to extend to vessels bound to any country situated to the southward of the equator."

Mr. J. CLAY said, that would not restrain vessels from clearing out for the coast of Africa and returning to the West Indies.

Mr. SMILIE asked if the words were not the same as had been stricken out; if so the motion was out of order.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD said the words were varied; the former proviso extended to the Mediterranean, and beyond the Cape of Good Hope; here not a word is said of the Mediterranean, but the language is confined exclusively to the southward of the equator.

Only fifteen members voting in favor of Mr. CROWNINSHIELD's proviso, of course it was lost.

Mr. EPPES suggested the propriety of amending the second section in such manner, as to make the captain and crew liable to punishment, if they should commit any violence or unlawful assault upon any vessel or territory of a nation in amity with the United States, or should make any other unlawful use of their arms. If the offence amounted to murder or felony they should suffer the punishment of murderers or felons; or if the offence should be of less degree they should be punished accordingly. He said it was well known that the privilege they were now about to bestow was not a right derived from the law of nature or of nations. If then it was no natural right, the Legislature have the right to dictate the conditions upon which they are willing to grant it. The first section provides a security against the improper use of arms, or as it were for their good behaviour. His amendment would go to provide a suitable corporal punishment for any offence they might commit after they had arms in their hands. It appeared to him that they were about to change the whole system of commerce. Instead of resting its success on the skill, enterprise, and industry of our mariners, we are about to give them force by which they may find their way to market. Your vessels are to be light, swift-sailing runners, capable of combat or flight. We shall hear no more of vessels of burden being employed in the West India trade. Upon the whole, he submitted to the House whether the public safety did not absolutely require this additional security. He had not however thrown this idea into form, but if it met the approbation of gentlemen he would endeavor to reduce it to writing.

Mr. J. CLAY would make a motion which would supersede the necessity of the amendment suggested by the gentlemen from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES,) that was, to strike out the whole of the second section.

Mr. EPPES asked if Mr. J. CLAY meant to propose a substitute.

Mr. J. CLAY replied that he did not, as he believed the bill would be effectual for its purpose without anything more than the first section, as it now stood amended.

On the question to strike out, there were fifty-three in favor of the motion, and forty-four against it. The section was struck out accordingly.

Mr. J. CLAY next moved to strike out the third section, which was carried without debate, by fifty-eight against twenty-two.

Mr. EUSTIS moved to amend the fourth section, so as to read, that if any armed vessel as aforesaid shall proceed to sea without a clearance, such vessel, &c. shall be forfeited to the use of the United States.—Agreed to.

Mr. EPPES moved a new section, in conformity to the idea he had expressed when the second section was under consideration. It was nearly as follows:

"That if any armed merchant vessel shall make or commit any depredation, outrage, unlawful assault, or violence, against any vessel or territory of a nation in amity with the United States, or against any of the citizens or subjects of such nation, or make any other unlawful use of the arms on board such vessel; if such depredation, &c. shall be made or committed, as if made or committed in any place under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, would be murder, felony, or misdemeanor, as the case shall be; and the principals and accessories concerned therein shall be punished as they would respectively be in other cases of murder, felony or misdemeanor, by the laws of the United States."

Mr. J. CLAY said he should be glad to hear the reasons on which this amendment was founded.

Mr. EPPES had stated, when he was up before, the reason for which he was induced to make this motion. The right of making war was, in all cases, lodged in the hands of the Government. When men entered into civil society, they abandoned whatever natural right they had to employ force against others, and vested their defence in those who were qualified to exercise the whole strength of the community. In our Government, the Constitution has delegated this power exclusively to Congress. Our merchant vessels have no right to arm, nor does the law of nations warrant it. If, then, Congress extend this privilege to merchantmen, Congress have a right to prescribe the conditions. He had also stated, that he did not consider the bond entered into at the custom-house an adequate security for preserving the peace of the nation, or preventing an improper use of cannon and ball entrusted to the citizens ranging the ocean in pursuit of wealth. Indeed, he thought the power confided to captains of vessels under this bill was too dangerous, and therefore Congress could not be too cautious in guarding against its abuse by every means in their power. It is true, the penalty enjoined by the new section is a severe penalty, but it does not affect any one unless he commits one of those improper acts it is intended to restrain; and if he willingly and wickedly does commit a crime, he incurs the penalty and deserves the punishment, and let him receive it, in order to check a similar licentiousness in others. He confessed some degree of surprise that gentlemen should ask for the reasons of the amendment, when they would not deign to offer any argument against it.

Mr. J. CLAY asked if it was meant to attach these penalties on a commander who shall, in resisting an illegal search, happen to kill or wound some of his adversary's crew? That right, he thought, was secured by the law of nations. If a vessel is attacked by pirates, may she not resist, and beat them off? This is the natural right of self-defence. He believed the provision of the first section was sufficient to prevent all voluntary transgressions; but shall a man who involuntary kills another by firing a cannon at sea, for any of the usual purposes, be hanged? If he is, is not this, then, a new and unusual punishment for such an offence, and such as is forbidden by our Constitution? Will any man say that this is a punishment proportioned to the crime?

Mr. EPPES requested the Clerk to read the amendment again, for the information of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as it was very evident to him that he had misunderstood the object of the section.

This being done, Mr. E. proceeded. The words "new and unusual," certainly might have been spared by the gentleman, for the punishment is exactly the same as what has been usual in every place under the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress. It subjects them for a similar crime, committed at sea, to the same punishment as if the offence had been committed in this territory of Columbia. The arms, it is said, are only given to them for their defence; well, will you not then take sufficient security that they shall not be used for offence? or shall they be permitted to trespass upon the vessels or territories of those in amity with the United States? He could not distinguish why murder committed on the high seas should be less murder than if perpetrated on shore. In both situations the offence was the same, and the punishment directed by the amendment was precisely the same; unless this was allowable, he did not see how Congress could annex even an old punishment to a new crime. If, however, the offence and the punishment were the same as heretofore, he could see no impropriety in passing the section he had offered.

Mr. LUCAS could not discover how his colleague had inferred that the right of arming merchant vessels was a natural right, or a right under the law of nations. He supposes a neutral may resist illegal search, or defend himself against a pirate. On these points he need not add anything, as they had been fully exemplified by the gentleman who moved the amendment. As to its inflicting new and unusual punishments, he could not make that discovery either; the punishment for the offence was the same when committed at sea as if committed in the body of a county; the only difference was as to the place where. In short, he thought the amendment a very proper one, and hoped it would be agreed to. He thought the object of the bill was not so much to preclude the continuation of the trade to St. Domingo, as to give a kind of half-way satisfaction to France in excuse for the iniquity of that trade, as it had for some time past been carried on. From what had been stated by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. McCREERY,) he supposed that the contracts for certain supplies to be furnished by the contractors in Maryland, and particularly in Baltimore, to the agents of the French Government, while at St. Domingo, had not yet been fully completed, but that shipments continued to be made, and the supplies destined for the service of the French actually were delivered at the ports as stipulated, although those ports were in the possession of the brigands. Under the intended regulation armed vessels will defend themselves to get in, which may produce a clashing of power between the contractors and the persons now lawfully commissioned by France to intercept the commerce between neutral nations and the brigands of St. Domingo. He admitted it was difficult to draw a line as to how far an armed vessel should be restrained in the exercise of her force. He knew there would necessarily be some latitude of construction, but he thought the best security which could be obtained was, to punish an abuse of the power conferred upon them, by making all the parties principals or accessaries, and punishing the offences in the same way as they would be punished if committed within the territory over which Congress have the power of exercising exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. SLOAN hoped he should always be careful how he undertook to speak on matters he did not understand. He had therefore remained silent on the bill so far as it had proceeded. He did not fully understand the commercial relations between the United States and other nations; but he had a full feeling and high estimation for the preservation of the peace and happiness of this country, and on this point he meant to express an idea which had occurred to him. He observed that it was but a very few years since merchant vessels were permitted to arm in any other case than that of actual and declared war. He supposed then, and still believed it was a dangerous experiment; he believed now that it was equally dangerous. Whether it was practically wise to pursue the St. Domingo trade, at such an immense risk, he would not say, as he had not as yet learned to calculate profits, when set against the peace and happiness of his country. He should not decide for those who understood this kind of political economy; but to his mind it resulted, from the arguments he had heard, that it would be better to restrain arming altogether. Yet, as a majority of the House had decided the contrary, he should not oppose their will, but he hoped they would endeavor so to secure this power from abuse, as to prevent to the utmost every possible evil which might otherwise arise to the unexampled prosperity of the Union.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD said he regretted the necessity of again troubling the Committee on this subject. The bill under consideration was highly interesting to the merchants of the United States. He had repeatedly stated his objections to the bill as it was first reported, and as it was subsequently amended, and had moved an amendment which had been finally agreed to. This was to strike out the cargo, so that bonds should be exacted only for double the value of the vessel, without reference to her loading, and he had the satisfaction to find that a majority had been found in favor of the proposal. Without repeating what he had observed formerly, when this subject was before the House, he would call the attention of gentlemen to the great value of some of the cargoes shipped from this country. He was convinced that the East India trade from the United States could not be carried on to advantage, if the merchants were compelled to give bonds in a sum equal to the full amount of vessel and cargo. This commerce was extremely valuable, and he hoped no embarrassments would be thrown in its way. If we wished to restrain the trade to a particular island in armed vessels, for his part he thought it might be done without touching the whole commerce of the United States, but he saw no reason why that trade was to be wholly interdicted. It might be well to oblige those who carried it on to enter into bonds to double the value of the vessel, tackle, and furniture, conditioned that no aggression should be committed on the vessel of a friendly nation, and he should not oppose this regulation; but, in doing this, he could see no necessity of extending these conditions to all other vessels. He said that he was certain, if the bonds were to be exacted for the cargoes of the East India vessels, it would fall extremely hard on the merchants of the Eastern and Middle States, who carried on a great and increasing trade to India. Some cargoes might amount to three, or even four hundred thousand dollars, and in such cases bondsmen could not be procured. In general, the cargoes were not near so valuable; but we employed upwards of one hundred and fifty vessels in the India and China trade, and he hoped no restraints would be imposed on that commerce. The ships engaged in voyages beyond the Cape of Good Hope were generally provided with arms, merely to defend themselves against pirates, who were sometimes found in those distant seas, and he knew of no instance where they had committed an aggression, or where they had made any unlawful use of their arms, and he presumed none would occur in future. Why, then, should we compel the owners of these vessels to give such heavy bonds? Why embarrass commerce unnecessarily? Commerce will be always most flourishing when left most free to individual enterprise. In some cases these bonds would operate to the injury of our European trade. It was well known that a vessel of two hundred and fifty or three hundred tons, loaded with sugar and coffee, would be worth nearly one hundred thousand dollars. Would any gentleman in this House be willing to sign bonds for his neighbor for that amount? They would not, it might be presumed. Is it probable, then, that one merchant will stand surety for another at the custom-house for these enormous sums? If the bill should unfortunately pass with a condition to include the value of the cargo in the estimate of the bonds, he ventured to predict that the revenue would be sensibly diminished for the next year. He would not be much surprised if it fell short nearly a million of dollars. It would be impossible to procure the necessary bondsmen in all cases, and the merchants must give up their voyages to the East Indies in armed vessels, and if they disarmed, they exposed their property to almost certain loss. If the bill was properly amended, Mr. CROWNINSHIELD said he believed he should vote for it, though he did not like all its provisions; but he supposed something must be done, and he would willingly consent to regulate the particular commerce so frequently alluded to, but he could not approve of the bill in its present form.

Mr. CLARK voted for the first section under an impression that it would be proper to permit merchant vessels in some cases to defend themselves. He was therefore willing that they should have arms on board for the purpose of self-defence; but while he was willing to provide for their security, he conceived himself bound to restrain them from the commission of crimes, and this amendment goes no further. It does not deprive them of the right of self-defence, and the privilege of repelling force by force. They are authorized to beat another vessel off when attacked, but they are restrained from becoming the aggressors. The amendment does not go to deprive a sailor of a single privilege at sea which he possesses on shore, and surely it will not be contended that because a man is a sailor he is entitled to exclusive privileges. A mariner has no right to attack another man on shore, neither ought he to be privileged to attack another at sea; but his rights, be they what they may, are the same both on land and sea. If this were a proposition to put arms in the hands of a man setting out on his travels, would any one object to punish him for every unjust and criminal abuse of such arms? There is not a member on this floor but whose mind would revolt at the idea of protecting such a man, more than if he had remained at home. Why, then, do gentlemen advocate a distinction between the man travelling by land, and another traversing the ocean? in each case the protecting arm of his country is extended to preserve to him his legal and Constitutional rights; in each case then also should the sword of justice perform its office without distinction or favor. This regulation, he was convinced, would have a beneficial effect upon foreign nations, as at the same time it would show them that we will protect our lawful commerce; that our citizens are not authorized to offend any other people, and that if they do they will be punished by their Government in a manner proportioned to the offence. On these two grounds he was in favor of the motion of amendment: first, it would go to prevent an offence by fear of the punishment; and, second, it would have a good effect upon the belligerent nations of Europe with whom we are at peace, to preserve our commerce from wanton spoliation.

Mr. SMILIE had also agreed to the first section of the bill, because he thought it useful that our merchant vessels trading to the West Indies, during their present unsettled state, should be permitted to arm in their own defence; but at the same time there was another circumstance equally important to be attended to, that was to preserve a peace between the United States and other nations unfortunately engaged in war. He was of opinion that since merchant vessels were permitted to arm, every precaution ought to be taken against the improper use of their arms. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CROWNINSHIELD) has represented the American merchants as a set of peaceable and harmless men. He did not carry his idea of the virtuous and forbearing disposition of this class of citizens quite so far; but he honestly believed they were as virtuous and honorable as any other set of merchants on the face of the globe. But he believed that they had all the infirmities to which mankind were liable, as well as other persons constituting the other classes of the community, to say nothing of the nature of their calling, which many writers supposed to be bottomed on principles of avarice. Be that, however, as it might, he did not think it impossible that a seaman's conduct at sea might at times be as irregular and as improper as a landsman's on shore. He could not think the crew of a ship at sea would be more orderly than our own citizens residing in our own territory. Yet, we have such crimes as felonies and misdemeanors, for the commission of which the law has furnished correspondent remedies, and why not make a similar provision for similar offences committed at sea? He did not know but the temptation at sea was stronger than on shore; a weaker vessel might easily become the prey of the stronger, and the impunity arising from concealment might induce men to risk something more in one case than in the other. In a moral point of view a murder committed at sea was as heinous an offence as a murder perpetrated on shore, and if committed on the body of a foreigner, the crime was as great in the eye of Heaven as if committed on a fellow-citizen. But he would ask gentlemen of what they were afraid? They must allow that the crews of vessels may commit these crimes. Do they wish to rescue them from condign punishment? Surely not. But if a ship's crew make no unlawful use of their arms, they are not obnoxious to any punishment. He hoped the amendment would be agreed to, for the honor of Congress and the security of the peace of the nation. He had good reason to believe that the agents of a certain nation had made loud complaints to our Administration with respect to the conduct of several American vessels trading to the West Indies. If this section is added to the bill, it will evince the disposition of the Government of the United States to preserve peace and do justice to all the nations of the world.

On the question to insert the new section proposed by Mr. EPPES, there were 56 in its favor, and 50 against it.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill with the amendments agreed to.

The House having agreed to consider the amendments,

On motion of Mr. J. CLAY an amendment was made substituting for the words "citizen or citizens," &c., the words person or persons resident within the United States or territories thereof.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD thought that giving bond for double the value of the vessel, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, was sufficient, without adding the cargo; if other gentlemen agreed with him, he hoped they would refuse their assent to so much of the amendment. The gentleman, (Mr. J. CLAY,) to be sure, had said that the bond taken in the case of East Indiamen was merely formal. He did not think Congress ought to legislate on this principle. When securities are demanded they should be for an efficient purpose, and not merely nominal. Why should a vessel sailing with arms to India be compelled to give security on her cargo, of 500,000 dollars, for a million of dollars? Is there more risk of an improper use of her arms than in the case of a West Indiaman with a cargo of $30,000, which gives security only for $60,000? or is a murder or felony committed by one vessel less a murder or felony if committed by another? and yet from the disparity of the bonds one would be led to suspect that such was the idea. Viewing this additional encumbrance on commerce as a shackle that would subject small traders to real inconvenience, while it would facilitate the enterprise of merchants of large capital and long established credit, he meant to call the yeas and nays on the question of agreeing to this part of the report of the Committee of the Whole.

DECEMBER, 1804.

Armed Merchant Vessels.

H. OF R.

Mr. J. CLAY said it was true that he had said that bonds given at the custom-house for East India ships were merely formal; it is not however because they are unnecessary or improper, but because the commanders of such vessels were men of such consideration and prudence that they would not subject themselves to the forfeiture, and so far he was willing to admit that the amendment would also be a mere formal regulation as to the clearance of armed East Indians. But as to vessels bound to the West Indies, it was a notorious fact that the value of the vessel and her equipment formed no proportion to the profits made on the cargo, if they have a fortunate run, and it was against the illicit commerce of such that he wished to be secure. He was unwilling unnecessarily to shackle commerce as any gentleman; but this regulation was not an unnecessary shackle, it was one absolutely required by existing circumstances, and will not work a hardship on any merchant engaged in a lawful commerce. One thing, however, he acknowledged it would effect. It will prevent in future that species of trade which, to say the least of it, approaches very near to illicit trade at the present moment. A merchant, willing to run the risk of such a voyage as he had alluded to, would prefer to make it unarmed rather than armed, because he knows the consequences, and the probability of transgressing some of the provisions of this act. It had been suggested that two bonds would be required; he did not believe they would, as it was not the practice under the law of 1798, which was expressed in the same terms as the amendment before the House. If the House should, however, consider this regulation as bearing hard on the East India trade, they might remedy it by refusing to concur with the Committee of the Whole in striking out the proviso.

Mr. EUSTIS did not consider the capacity of committing a crime as enlarged in proportion to the value of the cargo—perhaps it was the reverse. But he would observe, that if a captain with a very valuable cargo on board was to commit even a trifling misdemeanor against this act, the owner would lose his all—both vessel and cargo. Under such impressions, he imagined it would be extremely difficult to obtain the requisite security. Where is the man that can find security to the amount of a million of dollars that the captain of his ship, his officers, or crew, shall not commit some small degree of violence, even upon friends? for enemies may often assume the garb of friends, and thereby render even friends suspected. The law of 1798 required bonds only to the amount of the value of the vessel, tackle, and apparel, and did not even extend to the number of guns she might carry.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD again declared that commercial enterprise would be greatly diminished if a bond was required for both vessel and cargo. The consequence would be, that those merchants only who possess large capitals and independent fortunes could give bond. And while the young and small traders would be incapable of sending a single ship to sea, the large speculator would be enriching himself with the total profits of a very advantageous commerce.

Mr. J. CLAY said, the observations of the two gentlemen who preceded him applied against striking out the proviso; but he did not see that the position of the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. R. GRISWOLD) was of such great weight as he seemed to imagine. But, for his part, he did not see the ill consequence of regulations which might prevent rash speculations, on the part of young traders, upon small capitals, in engaging in voyages that overstrain their credit and prove their ruin. As it respected the trade to the West Indies, he hoped the House would agree to the amendment as it stood, and non-concur in the amendment for striking out the proviso. He would agree with them to retain the proviso if the present amendment was adopted.

On the question to agree to that part of the report extending the bond to double the value of the vessel, her tackle, apparel, furniture, and cargo, (the amendment being the words in italic,) it was negative—ayes 53, noes 55, as follows:

The new section being before the House, as reported by the Committee of the Whole,

Mr. ELLIOT hoped the House would not agree to this amendment. The gentleman who had moved it apprehended gentlemen had not well understood it when in the Committee of the Whole;

he questioned whether the mover had paid that close attention to its effects, as to insure its being proper and beneficial. He said it created a new class of crimes, and if that measure was proper, it was proper also to define the punishment of each crime. The section refers to certain laws of the United States establishing the enumerated offences, and directs that the punishment shall be conformable to the punishment inflicted for similar offences committed on shore. It is true the Constitution provides that Congress shall have power to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas; that power had been exercised, the crimes defined, and the punishments annexed. [Mr. E. here read an extract from the law on that subject.] A misdemeanor was a crime, but under the terms of the Constitution he did not see how Congress could legislate upon it unless they defined it a felony; and were gentlemen prepared to say that every depredation, every species of outrage or violence was a felony; he was persuaded it was not the intention of the mover. If a misdemeanor, however, be considered a crime, it ought to be defined, and the punishment decreed, for none of the laws of the United States had hitherto done it. On this view of the subject, he considered the new section totally unnecessary, or if necessary, it was so imperfect that it would not reach the case for which it was intended.

Mr. EPPES said the remark he had made in Committee of the Whole had no allusion to the gentleman last up. He should however detain the House but a moment in making one observation in reply. The law quoted by the gentleman was the one defining and punishing piracies committed on the high seas, and was confined to cases arising on board our unarmed vessels. Acts committed by persons legally commissioned to carry arms, are not termed acts of piracy; in order to constitute piracy it is essential that the vessel has no legal sanction to bear arms. That is a case that cannot arise under the present measure, which is to give a legal sanction to our merchantmen to arm, only restraining them by a penalty and corporal punishment, if they abuse their trust. It was necessary, in order to embrace this offence, that the definition and punishment should both be declared in the bill; he had endeavored so to do. As to the perfection or imperfection of the section in its present form, he should say nothing more than it appeared to his mind adequate to the end proposed. If however the gentleman from Vermont thought otherwise, he should be happy to hear him point out the mode of improvement.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD said that whether the effects to be produced by this section, so far as related to murder and felony, were really provided for under the existing laws, he would not assert positively; but he believed that neither the existing laws nor this section made any provision for the punishment of misdemeanors. The offences defined and punished were provided for many years ago, in 1790. By that law murder was punishable with death, the same crime and punishment were revived in this section, and so it is in case of felony.

Why then pass a new law on this subject? Or does the gentleman mean to infer that because murder or felony may be committed by armed vessels which are to be punished, that therefore murder or felony committed by unarmed vessels shall pass with impunity? He presumed in both cases they were to be punished under the existing laws. He saw no occasion to multiply our statutes unnecessarily. With respect to the punishment of misdemeanors, he should remark that the Constitution gave to Congress the power to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and violation of the law of nations. Those who acted on this subject before us, he presumed acted under an impression that they had gone to the extent of their powers in defining piracies and felonies, and that a definition of misdemeanors was not in their power. But suppose the Constitution gave this power to Congress, does the section provide for this? It certainly does not. What says the section? that persons guilty of misdemeanors shall be punished as other misdemeanors are punishable under the laws of the United States. He could not find any statute in the books defining these misdemeanors, or inflicting a punishment. How then was the offender to be punished, if there was no general law on this point? and from the cursory view he had given the statutes, he had found none: the section would be altogether nugatory so far as it related to misdemeanors.

Mr. EPPES could not refrain from expressing the surprise he felt that gentlemen should contend that misdemeanor was a term unknown in the statutes of Congress. He had just dipped into a volume of the laws, and he found it in almost every one which respected the criminal jurisprudence of the United States. Sometimes an offence is deemed a high misdemeanor; at other times a simple misdemeanor. Under the act of June, 1794, there were several misdemeanors, particularly expressed; accepting the command of an armed foreign vessel was a misdemeanor—increasing the armament of such vessel within the United States was a misdemeanor, and others to which punishments are annexed. He believed the wording of the section to be correct, but as gentlemen doubted it, he should not wish to press the adoption of a correct principle in incorrect language, and to give time for the required alteration, he moved an adjournment.

And the House thereupon adjourned.

FRIDAY, December 14.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, who were directed by a resolution of this House, of the twenty-second ultimo, "to inquire whether any, and what, regulations are needful to be made in the act for the regulation and government of seamen in the merchants' service, so far as respects the furnishing of ships and vessels with medicine chests, on their voyages to foreign ports," presented, a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act for the government and regulation of the seamen in the merchants' service;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

ARMED MERCHANT VESSELS.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported yesterday from the Committee of the whole House to the bill to regulate the clearance of armed merchant vessels.

The new section being before the House—

Mr. EPPES admitted that the objection taken yesterday, by the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. R. GRISWOLD) was in part correct. The offence of misdemeanor, contemplated by the proposed section, was not mentioned in the law of 1794; the offence of misdemeanor defined in that law, was that of fitting out or arming any vessel within the United States, for the purpose of cruising against nations in amity with the United States. He moved, therefore, to strike out the words, "or misdemeanor," as often as they occur, in order to separate them from those of "murder and felony," and to form a distinct and subsequent period in the section in relation to that subject, by saying, "and if the offence be of a less degree, it shall be a high misdemeanor, punishable by a fine not exceeding — dollars, and imprisonment not exceeding — years."

Mr. R. GRISWOLD agreed that it was proper to strike out the words alluded to, but he had doubts of the propriety of inserting all those which were proposed. It was plain that there was no general law of the United States, declaring the nature of the crime of misdemeanor, or its punishment. It is true that there are several of our statutes which prohibit certain specified things, and the persons guilty of committing them are deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor. But the terms used in the section reported by the Committee of the Whole, have no reference to any of the class of crimes designated in our statutes. It refers merely to the general common law under the head of misdemeanor. The gentlemen bring in a common law definition of misdemeanor, and give it a range over all that class of offences which it reaches in England. He wished the gentlemen, however, to meet the other objection, and answer whether the offences of murder and felony are not already provided for by the laws of the United States? He believed, still, that the law of 1790 embraced the very case now intended to be provided for by the amendment. If the section is adopted, are offenders to suffer death under the law of 1790, and again under the one of 1804? Can they suffer death twice? He thought if they suffered once, it would be sufficient for an atonement of the crime. If a misdemeanor is to be defined and punished by the section, let the gentleman confine his amendment to that crime alone, and so modify it that it does not re-enact an old law still in existence. If the gentleman did this, though he doubted the necessity, he should not object.

Mr. JACKSON said there had been two objections made by the gentleman from Connecticut and the gentleman from Vermont (Messrs. GRISWOLD and ELLIOT.) If they were attentively examined and compared with the Constitution and laws of the United States, they would be found not tenable. One of the objections was, that the Constitution of the United States did not authorize Congress to legislate on any other crimes committed on the high seas, than those of piracy and felony. He would ask them whether all other offences were to go unpunished? But he reminded them that the words of the Constitution extended further than what had been quoted; it declared in the same paragraph that Congress had power to define and punish offences against the law of nations. Is not a misdemeanor committed on board a vessel cognizable by the courts of the Union? For instance, if a gun is discharged at another vessel belonging to a nation in amity with the United States, and does considerable damage, though it may not amount to piracy or felony, is there no remedy? Surely by the Constitution Congress have the power of declaring it a misdemeanor, and of punishing it accordingly. If they have this power, and he believed it would no longer be denied that they had it, then the question would resolve itself into the expediency of exercising it at this time; and inquiry might be proper to ascertain whether the existing laws provided for the case. The act of 1790, upon which the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. R. GRISWOLD) relied, would be found on examination not to embrace it. Suppose, in firing into a foreign vessel, a mayhem is committed, or a leg or an arm shot off, is this case provided for by the law of 1790? It is not a felony, nor is it piracy, the only two cases provided for by that act. If, indeed, the case was provided for by the act of 1790, it could not operate as an objection to insert it in this bill, because the bill was intended to draw into itself all the regulations on this head. That Congress had the power of legislation on this point, he trusted would no longer be disputed; and, having the power, the necessity of the case required its exercise. If nothing further was added to the bill than what was contained in the first section, nine tenths of the offences committed at sea would go unpunished.

Mr. ELLIOT did not mean to give the force to the extract from the Constitution quoted by him all that range which the gentleman just sat down had chosen to extend; he however admitted that, being a Constitutional question, it deserved serious and solemn deliberation. It had been often said that the Constitution of the United States is a limited grant of power and that the powers not therein granted are reserved to the States or to the people. Admitted. By the Constitution, then, Congress are authorized to define and punish piracies or felonies committed on the high seas; they are also authorized to punish offences against the law of nations, as stated by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. JACKSON,) but where is the power given them by the Constitution to punish misdemeanors? It is, however, contended that a misdemeanor may be an offence against the law of nations. Misdemeanor means literally ill behaviour. He would not however deny that misdemeanor in certain cases might amount to an offence against the law of nations, and in such an event might be punishable as an offence against those laws.

By the law of 1790, in its 8th section, the crimes of murder and piracy are punishable. Does not that law go further, and punish what this law does not provide for? One thing further is contended for, which he did not think tenable; the same crimes that are punishable by the existing laws are again to be punished by this. This was clearly shown by the gentleman from Connecticut, and he would add nothing more.

Mr. CLARK thanked the gentleman from Connecticut for the light he had thrown on the subject; but he was not convinced that the crimes attempted to be defined by the amendment of his colleague were punishable by the existing laws of the United States, and he thought if the gentlemen would re-examine his argument he would discover his mistake. The law of 1790 had relation to a different crime. But he would not decide positively what might be the opinion of the Judiciary on that head; they might entertain a construction different from that of the Legislature. Yet his own opinion was that no provision could be found in the law of 1790 to restrain and punish the offence of an armed vessel of the United States on the commission of outrage and violence. Was the provision made in this law which his colleague had moved, he should not object to merchant vessels arming themselves; should it be refused, he never would consent to trust them with arms.

Mr. EPPES after having troubled the House so often on the present question, would have remained silent at this period; but such a variety of objections had been made, and many of them so foreign to the subject, that he could not avoid adding one concluding word. It might perhaps be considered as a reiteration of his first sentiment. He was decidedly opposed to trusting merchant vessels with public arms, the improper use of which might commit the peace of the nation. If, however, the sense of the Committee was against him, in that particular, he would submit; but then it must be under such a provision as had been introduced in the section now before the Committee.

Upon this the Committee rose, and the bill and amendments were postponed until Monday next.

MONDAY, December 17.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act concerning drawbacks on goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from the district of New Orleans," were read, and, together with the bill, ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That the Message from the President of the United States, communicating a report of the Surveyor of the Public Buildings at the City of Washington, on the subject of the said buildings, and the application of the moneys appropriated for them, which were read and ordered to lie on the table, on the sixth instant, be referred to Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. NELSON, Mr. HUGER, Mr. JOHN COTTON SMITH, Mr. GOODWYN, Mr. PLATER, and Mr. CUTTS; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

And the House adjourned.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Elections, of the tenth instant, to whom was referred, on the thirtieth ultimo, a petition of sundry citizens of the county of Washington, in the State of Pennsylvania, "complaining of an undue election and return of JOHN HOGE, to serve in this House as one of the Representatives for the said State;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported to the House their agreement to the same.

The House then proceeded to consider the said report of the Committee of Elections at the Clerk's table; and the same being read, in the words following, to wit:

"That William Hoge, member of the House of Representatives for the eighth Congress, having, by letter to the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania, dated the fifteenth of October, resigned his seat in Congress, the Governor, in pursuance of the provisions made in the second section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, issued a writ of election, to supply the vacancy which had thus taken place; that the said writ was issued on the twenty-second day of October, and the election directed to be held on the second day of November, eleven days after the date of the said writ; that the writ was brought by the mail to the prothonotary's office, in Washington, on the thirtieth of October, but not proclaimed by the sheriff till the thirty-first.

"It appears to the committee that, though by the second section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, it is made the duty of the Executive authority of the respective States to issue writs of election to fill vacancies, yet, by the fourth section of the aforesaid article, it is made the duty of the Legislature of each State to prescribe the times, places, and manner for holding such elections. It appears, however, that several elections to supply vacancies in Congress have been heretofore held in Pennsylvania, yet, on examining the laws of that State, it appears that no law exists prescribing the times, places, and manner of holding elections to supply such vacancies as may happen in the representation in Congress; and, consequently, if the election of John Hoge is, on this account, set aside, no election can be held to supply the vacancy, until the Legislature of the State enact a law for that purpose.

"By the law for the general election of Representatives to Congress from Pennsylvania, the sheriff is to give thirty days' notice before the election, and to make the returns within thirty days after it. This election is held near five months before the expiration of the existing Congress. By the law of said State for supplying vacancies in the State Legislature, the Speakers of the respective Houses shall issue writs to supply vacancies that may happen, giving at least ten days' notice. The Governor, in the case now before the committee, has directed the election to be held on the same day, &c., on which the Electors for President and Vice President were to be chosen. There is no proof before the committee of any abuse in the manner of conducting the election, in obedience to the writ issued by the Governor.

"While the committee are of opinion that the Legislature of Pennsylvania ought to have appointed, as near as might be, the times as well as the places and manner of holding elections to supply vacancies in Congress, and that, in ordinary cases, a longer period ought to intervene between the time of public notice and the day of holding the election, yet, considering the special circumstances attending the election of John Hoge, and particularly that the election took place on the day fixed by the Legislature for the appointment of Electors for the State of Pennsylvania, the committee are of opinion that John Hoge is entitled to a seat in this House."

Mr. LEIB said, he was opposed to the report of the Committee of Elections; he thought it a duty, therefore, to assign the reasons of his opposition. Were not the report to operate as a precedent for future decisions, he should have contented himself with a silent vote; but on this occasion he could not forbear expressing his dissent to the doctrine advanced by the Committee in support of the seat of the sitting member.

The Committee had made four points in their report; that the Constitution gives to the Executive of the State the power of issuing writs of election to supply vacancies; that if the election of Mr. Hoge be set aside, no election can be held to supply the vacancy until the Legislature of Pennsylvania pass a law regulating special elections; that there exists no law in Pennsylvania for the regulation of special elections for members of Congress; and that the notice of the Governor was sufficient, because it directed the election to be held on the same day on which the Electors for President and Vice President were to be chosen.

He would not deny that the Constitution of the United States gave to the Executive the power of issuing writs of election to supply vacancies, but he denied the power of the Executive to prescribe the manner and to fix the time of holding the elections. In the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution, it is declared, "that the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof." It is evident, therefore, that, although the Executive may have the power of notifying the vacancy, and directing it to be supplied, yet, that he cannot prescribe the time, the place, or the manner of carrying it into effect, this power being specifically delegated to the Legislature. If he can prescribe the time, he certainly can prescribe the place and manner, for the doctrine contended for implies an absolute discretion, and if the place and manner be also placed in Executive hands, he is vested with an absolute control over all special elections. Are the Committee prepared to sanction such a doctrine? Will they admit that elections on which the fate and safety of the nation may sometimes depend, shall rest upon Executive will?

Under the construction given to the Constitution by the Committee of Elections, the Governor may have directed all the citizens of Washington county to hold the election at the town of Washington, or at any other town he pleased, and he may have conveyed the superintendence of it to other officers than those appointed by the people. The power to issue writs to supply vacancies comprehended every incidental power, and the special election was wholly dependent upon Executive discretion.

He agreed with the Committee of Elections in the second point, that if no law exists to regulate special elections, and the election of Mr. Hoge is set aside, no election can be held to supply the vacancy until the Legislature of the State shall enact a law for that purpose; but he contended that a law did exist, and that the general rule governed the special case. The law for the regulation of the general election for members of Congress was the rule on this subject, and this rule ought to have governed the special case in question. By this law thirty days' notice is to be given, but, in this instance, only one day's notice was allowed. If thirty days' notice were deemed not more than sufficient for a general election, surely a special election, not less important to the district, required an equal time for information to be diffused, and consideration to be matured; and if this notice, pointed out by the law, had been given, he would dare affirm that the result would have been extremely different.

The Committee of Elections suppose that, because the election was notified for the day on which the election for Electors of President and Vice President took place, it was a sufficient notice. The testimony upon the table showed that only one day's notice had been given; that the writ had not been received until the thirtieth, and that the advertisement of the sheriff was not even prepared for publication until the thirty-first of October; the notice, therefore, could not have issued until the morning of the first of November, one day before the election was to be held. The county of Washington comprehends not less than six election districts, and is extensive, and he would ask how it was possible for the electors to be informed in one day? He averred that, in Philadelphia, where there are so many daily prints, and where information could travel with so much rapidity, that even there one day's notice would not enable the people to be informed; and could this be done in Washington, where the population was diffused over an extensive surface? It certainly could not.

The notice of an election for Electors was no notice for a member of Congress. The electoral election excited little attention, because it was not disputed; and, as there was no opposition, the people remained at home. How, then, did this operate as a notice? Those only who attended could have been informed. And was the notice to them to be taken as a notice to all? Would a notification of an election for charter officers in any of our towns be deemed a notice of an election for a legislator of the United States? And if not, by what process could the notice in the present case be made to apply? Are the rights of the people to be held by such tenure as is implied in this doctrine? He trusted not; and he hoped, therefore, that the Committee of the Whole would not affirm the report of the Committee of Elections.

Mr. FINDLEY said that, being chairman of the Committee of Elections, it was his duty to give notice to the Committee of the Whole House of the principles on which that committee made their report; that, in order to do this, it was necessary to state in what manner the case was submitted to the Committee of Elections. This, he said, was the more necessary, as no election had ever heretofore been contested before Congress on the same principles. No opposing candidate claimed the seat; no unlawful vote was even suggested to have been given; no officer entrusted with conducting the election was charged with error or corruption. There were two points alone, therefore, on which the decision must rest. The one was the Constitutional authority of the Governor to issue a writ to supply the vacancy that had happened; the other was, whether the Governor had exercised that authority in an incorrupt or unjustifiable manner. He said that the Committee of Elections had not been unanimous in approving the report; that two had voted against, and four for it; that, in this case, it not being necessary, he had not given his opinion; but that now, when the report was brought before the Committee of the Whole, and the case having originated in the State which he represented, and with whose laws and practice respecting elections he ought to be acquainted, he claimed indulgence and attention in offering some further explanations on the subject. For this purpose, he would examine the Constitution as far as it related to the case. In the second section of the first article of the Constitution, it is said, "when vacancies happen in the representation of any State, the Executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies."

In the fourth section of the same article, it is said, "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof, but Congress may, at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

Mr. F. said that on these Constitutional provisions there was a difference of opinion; that, ever since the commencement of the Federal Government, he had understood the general opinion to be, that the fourth section related solely to the general elections of Senators and Representatives, but not to supplying vacancies that might happen; that the State of Pennsylvania, and several other States, had uniformly acted agreeably to this construction of the Constitution; that the State of Pennsylvania had enacted five different Congressional election laws, all differing in several principles from each other, three of which he had assisted in preparing; but on all these occasions, though influenced by different parties, there had been but one opinion on this subject, and but one practice. In all cases the issuing of writs to fill vacancies was left to the discretion of the Executive, and in he believed four, if not five cases, which had happened previous to the present, the practice had been agreeably to this opinion. He said that he did not maintain that his opinion, or the opinion of the State he represented, on which it had so uniformly acted, decided the true sense of the Constitution; but he was still of opinion that it seemed to be the fairest construction, at least in cases where the Legislature had not interfered. The Executive shall issue writs, is the language of command; it renders the issuing of the writs an indispensable duty. The fourth section is equally positive in enjoining on the Legislature to appoint the times, places, and manner of appointing Senators as of Representatives, yet in the third section the Executive is authorized to appoint Senators to supply vacancies in the recess of the Legislature, and this is done probably to every Congress; but he believed the Legislature of no one State had prescribed any rules for supplying vacancies in the Senate, though the Constitutional injunction in that case on the Executive is certainly not so positively expressed, as with respect to issuing writs to supply vacancies which may happen in the Representatives. Taking the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution literally, as it applies to the general elections, it is impossible for the Legislature to mention the day on which a vacancy may happen, or consequently to appoint the day on which an election to supply a vacancy should be held, as it can do with the general election; therefore, it appears evident that the Constitution does not restrain the Legislature from establishing rules respecting it, if they choose to do so.

Mr. F. said that, from a view of the Constitutional provisions respecting elections, and some other objects, it had been the opinion of many that they were designedly calculated to give a latitude to the States to vary their conduct with respect to forms and circumstances, provided the essentials were preserved. On this ground only can the great variety of practice, under these rules, and all admitted by Congress, be accounted for. The first section of the second article of the Constitution directs that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors," &c.

From these words, Pennsylvania and several other States have always been of opinion, and practised accordingly, that it was the duty of the State Legislatures to prescribe the manner and rules agreeably to which the citizens should appoint the electors; but the Legislature of New York, and perhaps some other States, have not only always prescribed the rules or manner, but have themselves appointed the electors. This he said was more essential to the rights of the citizens than the case now before the committee; and yet, though universally known, had been, in every instance, admitted by Congress. The rule for the representation in each State has been prescribed by the Constitution; yet, in many States, the Representatives are chosen at a general election; in others, in single districts. In other States, even in Pennsylvania, some districts choose three members, some two, and some but one; but all of them may be chosen from any part of the State. Some other States have been divided, indeed, into single districts, and obliged to vote for candidates residing within their respective districts. He said he would not detain the Committee with further instances of the various, and yet approved practices under the Constitution, but hoped that even the members who might be of opinion that Pennsylvania had not given the Constitution, in the instance in question, the most correct construction, that yet they would duly consider other instances of variety of construction which had hitherto passed, not only without objection, but with approbation.

Mr. F. said that, since this case was returned to the Election Committee, he had heard the opinion of the Constitutional provisions, agreeably to which Pennsylvania had acted, called in question, but never before; that the objections were new to him; but, upon examining the laws of different States, he had discovered that the Legislatures of two or three States, though they had not literally prescribed the times for holding elections to supply vacancies, yet they had prescribed such rules to the Executive, in doing so, as answered the same purpose, and thought they did right; but Pennsylvania, and some other States, had not done so in any instance, and that in no instance, before the present, had an election been questioned, because the Legislature had not appointed these rules. The Legislature of Pennsylvania, not having prescribed any rules to the Executive to regulate his duty in issuing writs to supply vacancies, did not release the Governor from the Constitutional responsibility of performing a duty so positively and conditionally enjoined. Hence, Mr. F. concluded that the election could not be set aside merely on account of the Legislature not having enacted a law to prescribe the time of holding the election. The Governor had acted in obedience to the express words of the Constitution, and violated no law of the State. Setting aside this election on this ground, would virtually annul all the elections to supply vacancies in Congress that had ever taken place in the State of Pennsylvania, and in some other States.

By the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution, Congress is authorized, by law, to prescribe the time, place, and manner, of holding elections; but this must be done by law, not by a vote of the House, after an election was over; therefore, that power cannot apply to this case. Congress has passed no such law.

Mr. F. said, if the report of the committee was rejected, it must be on other grounds than this. It could not be because the Executive exercised his Constitutional discretion, but because he had exercised it in a corrupt, or in such an indiscreet or improper manner, as to vitiate the election. This was a fair subject of inquiry, on which there might, and probably would be, a difference of opinion; and, with respect to which, he admitted the propriety of several of the objections made by his colleague, who had just sat down. (Mr. LEIB.)

The Governor, it appears, issued the writ immediately on the resignation of William Hoge coming to him. He directed the election to be held on the same day, at the general election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President. The writ, it appears, laid one day in the prothonotary's office, before it was proclaimed, the sheriff and prothonotary being from home. The notice, after proclamation before the election, was only a part of three days, and not sufficient time for the citizens to be informed of it at their homes, notwithstanding that it is the smallest district in the State; but those who did attend at their respective districts to vote for electors, were actually informed by persons sent for the purpose. That this was the case was proposed to the committee, and proved by the sitting member; for the fact appearing to be admitted by the petitioners, such proof was thought unnecessary. It appeared probable to the committee that the district at the seat of justice at which the Governor's writ first arrived, had the advantage of earlier information than other districts; but this was incidental, and as the prothonotary, to whose office the writ came, and was opened, and the sheriff, &c., were opposed to the election of the sitting member, they had at least an equal advantage of the earliest notice, and those most zealous for the electoral ticket were not supposed to be his friends. Partial or fraudulent intention is not complained of by the petitioners; they are, indeed, few in number, and appear all to have had the earliest notice. There is no petition from any citizens, complaining that they themselves were deprived of their votes for want of notice. The election for the choice of electors was not so numerous as was reasonably expected; but if the Governor had given the ten days' notice directed by law for filling vacancies in the State Legislature, and claimed by the petitioners, this would have happened in about a week after the other, respecting which, the probability, justified by all experience in Pennsylvania, is, that it would have been still less numerous. This appears to have been the Governor's opinion. It was also the opinion of several of his colleagues from the eastern parts of the State, who had seen, and been informed by the Governor that he had issued the writ, and who had first informed himself that it had been issued. They, and all his other colleagues, with whom he had conversed on the subject, he understood, approved of the Governor's conduct, till they heard of the result of the election, and there was no proof before the committee that the shortness of the notice operated in favor of the sitting member more than the other candidate. All the voters for both candidates agreed in voting for the same electors, notwithstanding that there was little time for concert. On the whole, Mr. F. concluded that, as the issue of the election had occasioned exceptions to be taken to the shortness of the notice, he wished that longer notice had been given, though he had approved of issuing the writ. But, as it was conducted under an authority vested by the Constitution, on the same principle which had been always acted on in Pennsylvania, and several other States, and never heretofore objected to by Congress, which was the only competent judge in the case, and as no corrupt intention or abuse was complained of, he thought it his duty to vote in favor of the report of the Committee of Elections. If the election was set aside till a law would be passed to prescribe the time, probably the district would not be represented this session, which he thought an argument of weight, but of little importance compared with deciding the principle; in doing which, if the report of the Committee of Elections was rejected, the decision might virtually vacate the seats of the members, and would condemn all the elections heretofore made in Pennsylvania, and some other States, to supply vacancies to the House of Representatives.

Mr J. CLAY could not agree with the Committee of Elections, in the opinion that there was no law in Pennsylvania regulating the place and manner of holding special elections for members of Congress, to supply any vacancy which might occur in the representation from the State. By turning to the law respecting general elections, he found that members of Congress were to be chosen by the inhabitants qualified to vote for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, and that those elections were to be held at the same places, conducted in the same manner, and by the same officers, as for members of Assembly. In cases of general elections, therefore, there could be no difference of opinion; as these were to be governed in both cases by the same rules, it was fair to infer that special elections for Representatives were to be conducted in the same manner as special elections to fill vacancies in the Legislature of the State. By the laws of Pennsylvania, it appears that, in cases of vacancy in the representation of any county, the Speaker is to issue a writ at least fifteen days before an election can be held, and the sheriff of the county must make proclamation, and give at least ten days' notice to the people. The reason of the law was evident; it was intended to prevent the people from being surprised, and to give them time to look round for suitable persons to represent them. If the reason was good, as applied to the State Representatives, who were all chosen in single counties, it was more so as applied to Representatives in Congress, who are chosen in districts composed in some instances of three or more counties. He, therefore, was of opinion that they should be governed by the same law. The committee, however, had been told, by his colleague, (Mr. FINDLEY,) that the Legislature never intended to make any law on the subject; that they conceived they had no power; that the Constitution of the United States, by saying that, in case of vacancy in the representation of any State, the Executive thereof should issue a writ of election to fill such vacancy, was imperative, and, by making it the duty of the Governor to issue such writ, gave him the sole power of regulating the time, manner, and place, of holding the election, and precluded all Legislative interference. We were not to judge of the law, by the alleged intention of the Legislature; if they had mistaken their own powers or the powers of the Executive, their mistake was not to govern the decisions of Congress. All that we had to do was, to inquire whether there was a law applied to the case, and whether its provisions had been complied with. But he could not suppose that the Assembly had so far misconceived the Constitution. By the fourth section of the first article of that instrument, the State Legislatures were empowered to regulate the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives to Congress. This power was not confined to general elections, but must necessarily extend to elections to fill vacancies. It was true that, in special cases, they could not direct the precise time, but they might prescribe the notice which should be given; and shall we be told, because the very day cannot be named, that the number of days which shall intervene between the proclamation of the sheriff and the election, shall not be fixed by law? The notice is part of the manner, and the Legislature, though they cannot fix the time, may fix, and have fixed, the places and manner. It is true the Executive is compelled, by the second section of the first article of the Constitution, to issue a writ of election to supply a vacancy; but this writ he contended was merely a notification. It gave no power, no discretion. If the Governor had a discretion, it might extend to the place and manner. The northwest district of the State is very extensive; and, under this discretion, the Governor might so direct an election, that, in case of vacancy, the town of Pittsburg alone might be notified, and would alone vote for the member to supply that vacancy. But the case of a choice of a Senator during the recess of the Legislature had been resorted to as analogous to that of Representatives. If the Senator were chosen by the people, the case would be in point. Senators, when vacancies happen during the recess of the Legislature, are chosen by the Executive, and, therefore, there was no necessity for the Legislature to prescribe either time, place, or manner, as it would be absurd to suppose that the Governor should notify himself, or change his residence, in order to make an appointment. Would it be argued, therefore, that it was unnecessary to give the people due notice of an election for Representatives? Surely not.

But, said Mr. CLAY, the Governor has himself recognised the law in the very writ. Were not the same officers appointed to conduct this election, as were appointed to conduct the general elections? Were not the ballots given in the same manner, counted by the same persons, and returned by the same judges? Whence did they derive their authority, but from the law? And the law ought to have been complied with in every other respect. It is true, an election was to be held throughout Pennsylvania for electors of President and Vice President. The Governor, actuated by the most laudable motives, in order to save the county of Washington the expense of a special election, directed that a member of Congress should be chosen on the same day to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Mr. Hoge. But the committee would recollect that, although the people knew that electors were to be appointed, they did not, they could not, know of the intended choice of a Representative. In Pennsylvania the people do not, as in some of the Southern States, all meet at one place in the county to give their votes. No; each county is divided into a number of districts, in each of which an election is held, so that no person has more than a few miles to go to the poll. The county of Washington is divided into six or eight of these districts. The sheriff's proclamation was issued on the first day of November, and the election was held on the second; although the people of the town of Washington, and its immediate neighborhood, might receive due notice, it was impossible that those who resided and voted in the remote parts of the county, should. Indeed, it was evident that they did not. An election for electors was held on the same day. It was generally known that no opposition was intended, and the people were, therefore, less anxious about the result. The electors were chosen by a general ticket throughout the State; the votes of any one county were, therefore, deemed of comparatively little importance. This was not the case, however, with a Representative in Congress. The county of Washington forms a district for the choice of one member. The people of that county, not having the co-operation of any other part of the State, necessarily depend for success on their own vigilance and exertions. Yet what was the result? The bare majority given for electors exceeded the whole number of votes given, both for the sitting member and for the rival candidate. It was, therefore, evident that the people had not notice sufficient of the Congressional election. Mr. C. did not mean to impeach the motives of the Governor; on the contrary, he thought them praiseworthy; but substance ought not to be sacrificed to form. The object of elections was, that the majority of the people might have an opportunity of giving their fair and unbiassed suffrages in the choice of persons to represent them, and not through any mistaken constructions, however pure might be the intentions of the Executive, or of the Legislature. This object was defeated in the election. It was a manifest violation of the rights of the people, and ought not to be confirmed. This opportunity was not given in the present instance, or the sitting member would not have been returned. Conceiving this to be the case, and believing that the people had not that notice which by law they ought to have had, he considered the election void, and should vote against the report of the committee.

Mr. FINDLEY said, if the subject before the Committee of the Whole was an election law, he would cheerfully subscribe to many of his colleague's (Mr. CLAY's) observations. He admitted that Congress had a Constitutional authority to make laws, which would prescribe rules to regulate the exercise of the Executive discretion in issuing writs to supply vacancies; but neither Congress nor the State Legislatures have made such laws, but left it in the hands of the Executive, who is under an unconditional obligation to issue such writs, and who, in Pennsylvania and other States, always have done so, and the returns of elections on these writs have, in all cases, passed the decision of the Committees of Elections, and received the approbation of Congress. Therefore, as he said before, the question turned more properly on the discreet or proper use of the Executive discretion, than the right of exercising it. In order to prove that the Governor, in the case before us, had acted indiscreetly, Mr. F. said his colleague had observed how unreasonable it would have been for the Governor to have issued a writ with such short notice to a district which he had named, and which consists of three counties, and sends two members. The petitioners themselves argue from the extent of the Alleghany districts, which contain eight counties, thinly settled, and are spread over an extent of territory larger than some whole States. He thought it unfair to argue that, because the Governor gave such short notice to the least extensive and least numerous district in the State, a district consisting of one thickly settled county, and which had a Representative for less than thirty thousand inhabitants, and to correspond with another very important general election, the day on which it was to be held had been so long proclaimed that every man knew it, to charge the Governor with indiscretion, equal to what it would have been had he given but the same notice to the most extensive and dispersedly settled districts, at a time when no general election made it the duty of the citizens to be present on the election ground, was improper. As it was the Governor's conduct, and that only, that was called in question in this case, it was proper to observe that though his colleague was justified in saying that they had but one day's official notice, yet in fact, they had a part of two other days, and the writ having laid one day open in the prothonotary's office, as was understood, before it was proclaimed, through the absence of the sheriff, was not the fault of the Governor. If the Governor had done wrong, he did not wish to extenuate his offence, but he thought it improper to magnify the charge by supposed cases so essentially different.

Mr. F. observed that his colleague (Mr. CLAY) had maintained that the general Congressional election law of Pennsylvania applied also to the case of filling vacancies, and that it made it the duty of the Governor to give thirty days' notice before the election. If the gentleman would examine that law, he would find this opinion incorrect; it did not make it the duty of the Governor to give any notice: this duty was enjoined on the sheriff of each county; the sheriffs are enjoined to give thirty days' notice, and were allowed thirty days after the election to make their returns. After the returns were lodged in the Secretary's office, it was made the duty of the Governor, by proclamation, to give public notice to the members elected, and to transmit the returns to the Speaker of the House of Representatives in Congress. The Governor was not authorized, by the constitution or the laws of Pennsylvania, to issue a writ for holding any elections whatever. The authority of issuing a writ in the case in question was solely derived from the Constitution of the United States. This law could not be applied to elections to fill vacancies, without absurdity. The sheriff has sixty days for giving the public notice and making the returns; and adding to this a reasonable time for the Governor to make a proclamation, and the candidate at a distant part of the State, before he could go to Congress, in most cases the session would be over before the vacancy could be filled.

The petitioners themselves argue much more reasonably when they apply the law for filling vacancies in the State Legislature to the case; this law makes it the duty of the sheriff to give ten days' notice after he receives the writ from the Speaker of the respective Houses, in all cases when the Houses are not in session, to direct the vacancy to be filled at a general election. This is a reasonable law for the purpose, but prescribes no duty to the Governor, nor is it binding on him, yet the Executives have always acted as nearly to it in filling vacancies in Congress as circumstances would permit, and in this case it was only varied agreeably to the spirit of that law, in favor of the day on which an important general election was to be held. But, supposing the obligation of the general election law on the Executive in this case, the election officers having done their duty, is urged as a proof either that the general election law applied to this case, or that the election is void, because it was not conducted by officers authorized for the purpose. A brief explanation will remove the force of this argument.

By the laws of Pennsylvania, the election officers appointed annually for the elections held on the second Tuesday of October, are to discharge the duties of their respective trusts at all elections by the citizens for national purposes throughout the year. The constitution of Pennsylvania prescribes the manner that citizens shall vote, by ballot, &c. The laws of Pennsylvania institute the election officers, and prescribe their duty. The Constitution of the State and the United States and the laws of the State, declare the officer that shall be voted for; if the election officers conduct elections for officers not instituted by any of those authorities, it is void; otherwise, it is valid. It will not be said that an election to fill vacancies in Congress is not authorized by the Constitution of the United States, or that the Governor's writ did not sufficiently authorize the election of officers.

Mr. ELLIOT said that the very comprehensive and argumentative examination of this question, which had been made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. FINDLEY,) would probably have been conclusive to his mind had any doubt existed on the subject. Without repeating, however, any of the arguments of that gentleman, a candid consideration of the provisions of the Constitution, relative to this subject, will evince the correctness of the position taken by the Committee of Elections. In the second section of the first article of the Constitution, it is declared that "when vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the Executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies." It is an established principle that a Constitutional delegation of a general power includes a grant of all the subordinate and incidental powers requisite to give effect to the principal one, unless restrained, limited, or placed elsewhere by another part of the Constitution. What is the power given to the State Executives by this clause of the Constitution? Not merely, as some gentlemen seem to believe, an authority to issue writs of election, but to give to those writs a certain operation and effect, that of filling a vacancy. They have authority to issue writs of election, to cause elections to be holden in consequence, and the vacancies filled. Is the power here given to the Executives of the States limited or taken away by any other part of the Constitution? If not, I shall not suffer myself to inquire into the discretion or indiscretion with which it has been exercised on the present occasion, as I believe the Constitution has placed it beyond our power of inquisition or censure. By the fourth section of the Constitution, it is declared that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may, at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators." The words by law, in this section, are peculiarly emphatical. Congress can do nothing on this subject, but by law; the State Legislatures may act by resolutions, and in that manner Senators are commonly chosen. This section appears to have been intended to regulate the general election of the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which a State is entitled, and to have no application to the case of vacancies. But if this construction be not the correct one, it will be necessary to adopt this construction of the two clauses taken together, that although the State Legislatures have a right to regulate the elections in cases of vacancy, yet the Executive possesses a complete discretion on the subject, under the Legislative interference. Such, we are told, has uniformly been the practical construction in Pennsylvania. Two questions are only to be answered: Was the election in the present instance held in pursuance of a power delegated by the Constitution? Certainly it was. Was it regularly and legally conducted? It appears to have been conducted, except as to time, conformably to the laws of Pennsylvania which govern other elections. Believing that, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, no injustice has been done, and believing that the election was constitutionally conducted, I shall vote in favor of the report of the committee.

Mr. LUCAS.—Believing, as I do, that the report under consideration involves an important question, I cannot forbear to add a few remarks. It appears that members of Congress may be elected under two different circumstances—periodically by general elections, accidentally by special elections. The election of the sitting member (which is the subject of the report,) is a special election—an election to fill the vacancy of William Hoge, resigned. It is not alleged that any illegal votes have been given, or any fraud practised in conducting that election; it is merely contended by those opposed to the report that the election ought to be set aside, because the time, place, and manner of holding the election has not been according to law, or because the power of prescribing the time, manner, and place, has been assumed by an improper authority. Turning to the second section of the Constitution of the United States, we find this provision: "When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the Executive thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies." From this, it appears the Governor is only vested in part with the powers to cause an election to be holden—that is, the power of issuing a writ of election—which gives him the initiative; but this initiative does not destroy the power placed by the fourth section of the same Constitution in the State Legislature, which is, that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof." The words holding elections indisputably include all kinds of elections. A special election is not less an election than a general one; and unless the Constitution express an exception to that general principle, it follows necessarily that the State Legislature or Congress have the power of prescribing the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives. Thus, from the provision in the Constitution which vests the Executive of each State with the power to issue writs to fill vacancies, and from the provision which vests the State Legislature with the power to prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections, it appears that the powers necessary to cause elections to be held to fill vacancies are divided between the Executive and Legislative powers: the first is directed to issue writs of election, the second to prescribe the times, places, and manner for holding the same: both are bound by a Constitutional injunction equally imperative. Thus, that an election to fill a vacancy be legal, the Executive and Legislature must have co-operated to that election by the exercise of their respective Constitutional powers. If the election under consideration hath been holden under the authority of but one of these powers, it is not according to the Constitution, inasmuch as the Constitutional exercise of the power of the one, without the concurrence of the other, is but a lame power.

The report states that this election was held without the concurrence of the Legislature; that is, that the State Legislature hath omitted to prescribe by law the times, places, and manner of holding elections to fill vacancies. This being the case, the power of causing the election to be holden was incomplete; and if its deficiency was supplied, it was by an authority other than that designated in the Constitution.

But a gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. Griswold) contends that, by the Constitution of the United States, in the second section of the first article, requiring the Executive authority of each State to issue writs of election to fill vacancies, the Executive became vested with the absolute power of causing elections to be holden, and that all other powers necessary to carry that act into effect are implied, and can lawfully be exercised.

To this, it may be answered, that the Constitution of the United States hath been careful in distinguishing between the substance and forms of elections. The substance of elections, which consists in the right of electors, and the result of the exercise of that right, hath been sufficiently expressed. The Legislature of each State has been expressly vested by the Constitution with the power of regulating the forms, which consists in prescribing the times, places, and manner of holding elections. If the construction of the gentleman from Connecticut were correct, the consequence would be that two provisions of the Constitution would militate against each other; that is, that the Executive would, from the power he hath to issue writs of election to fill vacancies, derive by implication the power of prescribing the times, places, and manner; that is, would have by implication a power which the Constitution expressly vests in the Legislature of each State, and which appears to be a subject of such importance that Congress is empowered to control the State Legislatures in that very case. The gentleman from Connecticut hath gone further: he hath said that, admitting for a moment that the power vested in each State Legislature to prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections, which he believes extends only to general elections, should extend to elections to fill vacancies, yet that, inasmuch as the Legislature of Pennsylvania did omit to legislate on that subject, the Government had a right to supply the omission by assuming that power. In this argument, I answer, that as none of the constituted authorities can transfer, by any act whatever, the power lodged by the Constitution in any of them, by a stronger reason no transfer of power can be made by their omission to act. The security of our political system rests principally upon the Constitutional partition of the Constitutional powers. The Constitution doth not only require that none but the powers which it grants should be exercised, it also requires that they should be exercised only by the authorities to which they are confided; and to contend that the omission of the Legislature to legislate entitles the Executive to perform acts of legislation, is a position too preposterous to require refutation.

It has been urged that it would be out of the power of the State Legislature to prescribe the time of holding elections in pursuance of the writ of the Executive to fill vacancies, because the Governor issues his writ under the immediate authority of the Federal Constitution, and this power cannot be impaired, or receive modifications by a legal State Legislative act. It has been added, that this election to fill a vacancy being the result of a contingency, the time cannot be prescribed by law. I grant that the time cannot be absolutely prescribed, but I contend that it can be prescribed relatively, and so it is prescribed, too, by the law of Pennsylvania, regulating the times, places, and manner, of holding elections to fill vacancies in the Legislature. Upon issuing a writ by the Speaker of either House, a time is fixed which bears relation to the time of issuing the writ, or proclaiming the election in pursuance of the writ; and as this relative prescription of time does not limit or abridge the power of the Speaker, so a similar relative prescription of time, with respect to the time of proclaiming an election under the writ of the Governor, would not abridge or impair the exercise of his right.

Independent of the radical deficiency of the election alluded to in the report, on Constitutional grounds, it cannot, in my opinion, bear the test, in point of discretion or inquiry. The shortness of the notice offers to my mind an insuperable objection. From the report before us, it appears that the sheriff of Washington made a proclamation of the election on the 31st of October, and that the election was holden on the 2d of November. It was not only morally impossible, but it was physically so, that one-third of the electors could be informed; but this objection has been anticipated on this floor, and great endeavors have been made to justify this shortness, I might say the want of notice, by alleging that the 2d day of November had been preferred, it being a day already appropriated for the election of electors, and that the notice given for that election would answer the purpose of the election of a Representative in Congress, while it would save the electors the trouble of assembling again. These considerations, more specious than solid, cannot prevent me from discovering the whole extent of danger of holding elections without certain principles and rules with respect to a previous notice. It was generally believed in Washington county, as well as in every other part of Pennsylvania west of the mountains, that the election of electors would, without any risk, be carried according to the wishes of a large majority. Hence, many persons, far distant from their respective election districts, did rely upon those that were nearer to attend the election of electors; hence the result of the election of a member of Congress. Had the electors of the district been informed, as they ought to have been, that a member of Congress was to be elected on that day, although there was no danger of risking their object as to the election of electors, yet there might be some doubt as to the election of a Representative. Have we not every reason to believe, from the repeated instances of public spirit prevailing in that district, that the election would have been attended by probably more than three times the number of persons than did actually attend? and as to myself, I have a strong presumption that the result would have been quite different from what it was. Some of the gentlemen who supported the report have endeavored to justify this election on the ground of precedents. They have said that all former elections in Pennsylvania, to fill vacancies in Congress, have been holden under the same authority and circumstances. It is not improper to take notice that this election is the first of the kind that has been contested in Pennsylvania; that as no exceptions were taken to the former ones, it is an ordinary thing that the Committee of Elections report as legal elections those that appear such from prima facie evidence, and they never enter into details but when the elections are disputed. Ought precedents to govern where they militate against an express Constitutional provision? And will gentlemen say that elections to fill vacancies, held after thirty days' notice, such as the first election of William Hoge and others were, can be received as a precedent in point, with an election held after one day's notice?

It has been the pleasure of some honorable members to bring into view the motives that have actuated the Governor of Pennsylvania in directing the election to be holden after so short a notice. The purity of these motives has been insisted upon, as if any member of this Committee were questioning the good intentions of that magistrate; but the intentions of the Governor, pure as I doubt not they were, cannot be the criterion to judge of the legality of this election. The Governor may think one way, and the Committee another, and yet we may all be influenced by good intentions. From the present view of the subject, I am induced to vote against the report. I lean still more to the rejection of the report, as, by setting this election aside, the Legislature of Pennsylvania, which is now in session, will feel more immediately the necessity of exercising Constitutional powers, and of prescribing, by law, the times, places, and manner, of holding elections to fill vacancies in future.

Mr. JACKSON.—Mr. Chairman, two objections have been made by the gentleman to the report of the Committee of Elections: First. That the Constitution of the United States requires that in all cases the times, places, and manner, of holding elections shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; and as no law has been passed in Pennsylvania providing for the cases of supplying vacancies in case of death or resignation, that the election of Mr. Hoge is invalid. Second. If the Constitution does not conclude the question, we have a right to examine all the circumstances incident to the proclamation of Governor McKean, and to determine whether the discretionary power vested in him by the Constitution, as the Executive of Pennsylvania for the time being, was duly exercised or not; and it is asserted that it was improperly exercised by him.

The fourth section of the first article of the Constitution, upon which the superstructure of the arguments on the first point rests, is in these words: "The times, places, and manner, of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof." The language of the section clearly proves it has reference to the general elections, and precludes the idea that it was intended to include the cases of vacancies, as no human prudence could designate the proper time for holding elections to supply vacancies that would thereafter occur. Who can determine when the incumbent will die? When the unrelenting hand of death shall cut the thread of life, or when some occurrence in life shall induce him to resign into the hands of the people the trust reposed in him? And, unless these things are foreseen, the State Legislature cannot say at what time, at what place, and in what manner, elections to supply vacancies shall be held. If the Legislature were to pass a law regulating the time only, and leaving the place and manner to the direction of the Executive officer conducting the election, on designating the place, and leaving the time and manner to be fixed by him, it certainly would not be a compliance with the requisitions of the Constitution, and a person thus elected would not be constitutionally entitled to a seat in this House. In the construction of a grant it is necessary that the person thereby claiming a privilege shall show that he has complied with all its requisitions, and being imperative, that the States shall prescribe the time, place, and manner, of holding elections. I doubt very much whether a compliance with either requisition alone would be correctly within the meaning and spirit of the Constitution.

I am the more inclined to adopt this construction, when I refer to the paragraph contained in the second section of the first article, which declares that "when vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the Executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill 'vacancies.'" Either this sentence has some meaning, or it has not. If it has any, it clearly follows that the cases of vacancies are provided for in a different way from that directed by the fourth section, which succeeds it. Mr. Chairman, when I contemplate the great talents and wisdom which the framers of this instrument possessed in an eminent degree, and the perspicuous and emphatic language which characterizes its provisions, that not only every paragraph, but every word of each paragraph, conveys some meaning, I cannot reject the sentence just read as a dead letter, unmeaning and inoperative; and, unless it is rejected, the Executive authority of any State has the power, and is required, to issue writs of election to fill such vacancies as may happen in its representation, independent of any State law or provision, and in conformity with the supreme law of the land.

Some gentlemen, however, contend for a limited construction of this clause, granting to the Executive authority to issue writs of election, by denying the right of designating the time, place, and manner, of holding such elections. But it is not to be presumed that a power so merely nominal would be guarded by the insertion of an independent and express provision. If, however, I err in the opinion I have advanced, I deny the propriety of making a contrary opinion at this late day. The States, the great party to the compact, have, without a single exception that I know of, considered that vacancies are to be supplied by writs of election under Executive proclamations, and have not passed any law upon the subject. A respect for their decisions, for the uniform practice of this House, and a consciousness that if we err, it is on the side of justice, will, I hope, incline us to sustain the report. If we do not, I call upon gentlemen to go through the House, to examine the rights of every individual to a seat, and to decide all cases similar to the one now before us, in the same way.

Sir, we have no law in Virginia providing for similar cases. I speak from present impressions. If I am mistaken, I will thank gentlemen to correct me. Two of my colleagues (Messrs. CLARK and WILSON) now hold their seats in virtue of elections to supply vacancies occasioned by death and resignation. If the gentleman is not entitled to his seat upon Constitutional principles, my colleagues are not. If they are, he is. One gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. CONRAD) however, varying the ground of objection, says, the laws of Pennsylvania provide for the case, and require a notice of twenty days previous to holding elections; and, as twenty days' notice was not given, this election is void. The language of the law he read proves that he is mistaken. It provides for issuing writs of election by the Speaker of the Senate, or of the House of Representatives, as the case may be, to supply vacancies; and as neither branch of the State Legislature, as such, has anything to do with the elections of Representatives to Congress, it must clearly apply to members of the State Legislature only.

I will now consider the right of examining the conduct of the Executive of Pennsylvania, and of controlling the discretionary power vested in him; and, first, permit me to declare that I believe it is entitled to the highest approbation, and was well calculated to procure a fair and honest expression of the public will. Congress were in session; the district of Washington unrepresented, and the necessity of providing for the exigency as soon as possible most apparent. An important election, the most important, sir, which occurs under our Constitution, about to take place for the appointment of Electors to choose a President and Vice President of the United States; and upon that day, by the Governor's proclamation, was this election also to be holden. True, sir, a lengthy notice was not given, without suffering this election to pass by, and requiring the people to assemble a second time, under a short interval, which would have been highly inconvenient. He had reason to believe that all the people would have attended; it was eminently their duty to do so, as the magnitude of that election was great beyond comparison, when considered with the other.

A gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. CONRAD) has told us that he wishes the elections to be more frequent, as it is the interest and duty of the people to attend them. Where were they, I ask him, when the electors were chosen? Were they, regardless of their interest and duty, asleep at their posts? Sir, the fact proves the unwillingness of the people to attend; and, were the elections more frequent, their neglect would increase with their numbers. I will not dwell longer upon this subject, in supporting the conduct of the Governor of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HUGER) has done ample justice to it. I now deny the right of this House to supervise or control the Executive of a free and independent State, and call upon gentlemen to show me whence the power is derived. It cannot be too often repeated that ours is a limited grant of powers; no constructive or implicative power is to be exercised by us. This is the language of the Constitution. It is the language of common sense. If we have the power, I ask, how is it to be exercised? Shall we erect ourselves into a high court of criminal judicature with censorial powers? Shall we say the Governor of Pennsylvania acted from corrupt motives? That he was influenced by a desire to control the district of Washington in opposition to the people? Unless we do, sir, I see no ground for interposition. Mr. Chairman, there is no power vested in this House more dangerous in its injudicious exercise than the right of judging of elections, returns, and qualifications, of its members. By it a party may determine of what number the minority shall consist, and even whether there shall be any minority at all. I will never consent to exercise this power, even legitimately, except in cases of emergency, or urgent necessity.

When Mr. JACKSON had concluded, so much as is contained in the last part of the fourth clause of the report, was again read, in the words following, to wit:

"The committee are of opinion that John Hoge is entitled to a seat in this House."

And on the question that the House do concur with the Committee of the whole House in their agreement thereto, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 69, nays 38, as follows:

THURSDAY, December 20.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to amend the charter of Alexandria. The principal feature of the bill is the extension of the right of suffrage. A motion to strike out the first section, produced considerable debate; and was lost by a large majority. The bill, after undergoing several subordinate amendments, was reported to the House, who took it into immediate consideration, and ordered it to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday.

FRIDAY, December 21.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the committee to whom was recommitment the bill to regulate the clearance of armed merchant vessels, as amended, reported that the committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

Mr. DANA, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of the late General Moses Hazen; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

An engrossed bill establishing rules and articles for the government of the Armies of the United States, was read the third time, and amended at the Clerk's table, by the unanimous consent of the House: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, and that the title be, "An act for establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States."

A petition of sundry British merchants, and others, subjects of his Britannic Majesty within the United States, whose names are thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House and read, praying that the power and authority granted by law to the federal circuit courts may be extended to the trial and determination of "all causes arising under treaties," or to causes where an alien is a party, in which the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, is under the sum of five hundred dollars; or that such other tribunal may be established for the trial and determination of the said causes; as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.—Referred to Mr. CLOPTON, Mr. GEORGE WASHINGTON CAMPBELL, Mr. GAYLORD GRISWOLD, Mr. BOYLE, and Mr. HUGER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill declaring Cambridge, in the State of Massachusetts, to be a port of delivery; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time on Monday next.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the same committee, who were instructed by a resolution of this House of the seventh instant, to inquire into the expediency of so far amending the act "to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, as to allow the Collector of the port of Philadelphia an additional deputy," presented a bill to authorize the Collector of the port of Philadelphia to act by an additional deputy; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the disposal of certain copies of the laws of the United States." The bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which were twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be read the third time on Monday next.

Mr. PURVIANCE gave notice that, on the third Monday of January, he intended to introduce a resolution giving to the District of Columbia a durable legislature of their own, on which the opinions of the Heads of Departments were to be obtained.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, moved that the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a statement of the officers and privates of the several corps in the actual service of the United States during the years 1804 and 1805, and the names of the ports and the numbers of the officers and soldiers occupying the same; also, a detailed statement of the moneys expended on the several fortifications, arsenals, armories, and magazines, of the United States during the aforementioned period.

Mr. VARNUM doubted whether the Secretary of War could give all the information required, particularly as he could not make up returns of 1804 until some time in 1805.

Mr. DANA did not know that there was any military secret in the disposal of the small military force of the United States, but he did not think it prudent to give a written document on this subject, lest any nation of Indians should occasion some trouble to a post but weakly manned.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, in answer to Mr. VARNUM, replied, that if the Secretary of War could not give the information required he should say so. On the observation of Mr. DANA, he replied that in his opinion the representatives of the nation ought to be acquainted with the number of their troops and their respective stations.

Mr. EUSTIS requested the resolution might lay on the table till Monday.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, acquiesced, and the motion lies accordingly.

COLLECTION OF DUTIES.

Mr. LEIB moved that a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law to authorize the Collectors of the several ports of the United States, to deposit for collection the bonds received by them for the payment of duties, in the Bank of the United States, or any of its branches, or in any of the chartered banks of the several States. In support of the reference, he remarked that the resolution contemplated an inquiry, and an important one. The Bank of the United States and its branches had usually a deposit of the moneys of the Government to the amount of between four and five millions of dollars; that by means of this deposit that bank was enabled not only to hold the mercantile interest tributary to the institution, but all the banks of the States. His object was to equalise the benefits, and not to permit that institution to monopolize an enormous profit from the treasure of the nation. He wished to unfetter the bank institutions generally, and he hoped the inquiry would obtain, and he believed the bonds due to the United States would be as carefully collected in the chartered banks, which are at the same time equally secure, as that of the United States or any of its branches.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD recollected this subject was suggested at a former session, and as it had a relation to the management of our finances he thought it would be more proper to refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means; he made that motion accordingly.

Mr. LEIB did not see that the subject necessarily appertained to the Committee of Ways and Means. It had no relation to the increase or decrease of the duties on imports, but merely to the deposit of the bonds given by the merchants to the Collectors. His true object was to prevent a monopoly, and he trusted gentlemen would not be enabled to defeat it by this mode of reference.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD understood the motion to relate to the deposit of the bonds, but it would be proper to inquire into the safety of such deposit before it was authorized by law; and in his opinion the Committee of Ways and Means, from the habits of their business, was as competent to make the inquiry as any select committee.

On the question, it was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means—51 being in favor of such reference, and 41 against it.

MONDAY, December 24.

Mr. LEIB, from the committee appointed, on the fourteenth ultimo, to "inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, for the completion of the public buildings belonging to the United States, near Philadelphia," made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

An engrossed bill to amend the charter of the town of Alexandria was read the third time; and the further consideration thereof postponed until Friday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to divide the Indiana Territory into two separate governments;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

ARMED MERCHANT VESSELS.

An engrossed bill to regulate the clearance of armed merchant vessels was read the third time; a debate of considerable length took place. Messrs. DANA, R. GRISWOLD, and DENNIS, spoke against the bill, and were replied to by Messrs. EPPES, SMILIE, JACKSON, and EUSTIS: Whereupon, a motion was made and seconded that the said bill be recommitted to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House; and, the question being put thereupon, it passed in the negative.

Another motion was made, and the question being put, to recommit the second section of the bill to a Committee of the Whole House, it passed in the negative. And then the main question being taken that the said bill do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 33, as follows:

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims, of the thirteenth instant, to whom was referred the petition of John Steele, late Secretary of the Mississippi Territory, presented the twenty-first of December, one thousand eight hundred and three; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the proper accounting officers liquidate and adjust the account of John Steele, for his services as Secretary of the Mississippi Territory, from the seventh of May, one thousand eight hundred and two, to the second of March, one thousand eight hundred and three, inclusively; and that there be paid for his salary and official expenditures, such sums as are allowed by law to persons acting in that capacity.

Ordered, That a bill, or bills, be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the Committee of Claims do prepare and bring in the same.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to incorporate the Washington Building and Fire Insurance Company. The bill was reported with several amendments, which were twice read, amended, and agreed to by the House.

On motion it was agreed to consider the resolution, and on the question will the House agree to the same, it was carried nem. con.

CHARTER OF ALEXANDRIA.

A memorial of sundry resolutions of a number of the inhabitants of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, in approbation of the principles contained in a bill now depending before the House, to amend the charter of the town of Alexandria; also, sundry resolutions of a number of other inhabitants of the same town, in opposition to the said bill; were presented to the House and read: Whereupon,

Mr. LEWIS called for the third reading of the bill to amend the charter of the town of Alexandria.

A lengthy discussion took place on the passage of the bill, which was opposed by Mr. LEWIS, and its postponement contended for by Messrs. DENNIS, GREGG, EARLY, R. GRISWOLD and GODDARD. The bill was advocated by Messrs. LYON, ELMER, LEIB, EPPES, SMILIE, and G. W. CAMPBELL, who likewise opposed the postponement.

On the question to postpone the bill till the first Monday in December next, it was lost, 44 being in favor of the postponement, and 60 against it. On postponing till the first of February the question was also lost, 42 in favor and 58 against it.

A motion was then made to recommit the bill to a Committee of the Whole in order to withhold from aliens the right of holding real estate within the bounds of the corporation, and to make some other alterations, which, though not very material, would give satisfaction to the party in Alexandria who opposed the passage of the bill.

On the question to recommit, there were 36 in the affirmative, and 61 in the negative; so the motion was lost.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH then spoke against the passage of the bill, and was replied to by Messrs. DAWSON, and G. W. CAMPBELL.

And then the main question being taken that the said bill do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 55, nays 51, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, jr., Isaac Anderson, John Archer, David Bard, George Michael Bedinger, John Boyle, Robert Brown, William Butler, George W. Campbell, Thomas Claiborne, Christopher Clark, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, Frederick Conrad, Jacob Crowninshield, John Dawson, Ebenezer Elmer, John W. NAYS—Nathaniel Alexander, Simeon Baldwin, Silas Betton, William Blackledge, Adam Boyd, William Chamberlin, Martin Chittenden, Clifton Claggett, Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, John Dennis, William Dickson, Thomas Dwight, John B. Earle, Peter Early, James Elliot, William Eustis, Calvin Goddard, Edwin Gray, Andrew Gregg, Gaylord Griswold, Roger Griswold, Seth Hastings, John Hoge, James Holland, David Hough, Benjamin Huger, Samuel Hunt, Joseph Lewis, jr., Henry W. Livingston, William McCreery, Nahum Mitchell, Thomas Plater, John Randolph, John Rhea of Tennessee, Samuel Riker, Thomas Sammons, James Sloan, William Stedman, Samuel Taggart, Benjamin Tallmadge, Samuel Tenney, George Tibbitts, Philip Van Cortlandt, Joseph B. Varnum, Daniel C. Verplanck, Peleg Wadsworth, John Whitehill, Lemuel Williams, and Marmaduke Williams.

Mr. VARNUM suggested that his colleague from Massachusetts (Mr. LARNED) had made a mistake in his vote on the Alexandria bill, which he wished to be permitted to rectify. Whether it would alter the decision of the House he did not know. The gentleman voted for the bill, though he was against it altogether, under an impression that he was voting on the question of recommitment instead of its final passage. If he was permitted to record his vote according to his intention, it would make the result stand 53 to 52; and if the SPEAKER was to add his vote to the minority, the bill would not pass.

This gave rise to a great deal of conversation relative to the rules of the House and its uniform practice, which appeared to have been against an alteration of the vote by yeas and nays, unless the alteration would produce no effect upon the vote by changing the majority into a minority. This idea was combatted by the reason of the thing. It was deemed extremely improper to confine members to a lapsus lingue, without suffering them to explain. While the argument was going on, Mr. BECKLEY (the Clerk) had been induced to examine his list of yeas and nays with the most careful scrutiny, and had discovered that in the numerical list of votes he had marked the same number twice among the yeas, so that in fact there were 55 yeas and but 51 nays. The alteration requested being now found not to alter the decision, several members hoped the gentleman might be indulged; but this being to be done by the unanimous consent of the House, and Mr. CONRAD refusing his consent, the alteration was not made. Four motions were made to adjourn during the debate, and the last succeeded.

MONDAY, December 31.

An engrossed bill for the relief of John Steele was read the third time and passed.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand eight hundred and five; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That a post road ought to be established from the City of Washington, on the most convenient and direct route, to pass through or near the Tuckabatchee settlement to the Tombigbee settlement, in the Mississippi Territory, and from thence to the city of New Orleans.

2. Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House any documents, and give such other information as he may think proper, relative to opening a post road from the City of Washington to the City of New Orleans.

The first resolution being twice read, was, on a motion made, ordered to be referred to the Committee of the whole House, to whom was committed, on the seventh instant, a motion respecting "the establishment of a post road from Knoxville, in the State of Tennessee, to the settlements on the Tombigbee river, in the Mississippi Territory, and from thence to New Orleans; also, for the establishment of a post road from Georgia to the said settlement on the Tombigbee, to intersect the former road at the most convenient point between Knoxville and the Tombigbee."

The second resolution being twice read, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That Mr. HOLLAND and Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL be appointed a committee to present the second resolution to the President of the United States.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, enclosing a letter written from Malta by Richard O'Brien, our late Consul at Algiers, giving some details of transactions before Tripoli. The Message and letter were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. EUSTIS, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to lay before this House a return of the number of American seamen who have been impressed or detained on board the ships of war of any foreign nation; stating the names of the persons impressed; the name of the ship or vessel by which they were impressed; the nation to which she belonged; and the time of the impressment, so far as may be practicable; together with any facts and circumstances, relating to the same, which may have been reported to him.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GREGG called up the resolutions for a recession of the District of Columbia to the States of Maryland and Virginia.

Mr. HUGER moved to postpone the same till this day week.

Mr. JACKSON moved to postpone them till the 31st December next.

Some desultory remarks were made, not touching the merits of the main question; at length the question was taken on postponing till 31st December, and lost, without a division.

On postponing till Monday next, the question was decided in the affirmative—59 for and 31 against it.

An engrossed bill to incorporate the Washington Building and Fire Insurance Company was about being read, when

Mr. GREGG expressed a wish that it might be postponed, and a speedy decision had on the question of recession. He understood this was the day fixed for that subject.

Mr. LEWIS observed that the motion for recession could have had no effect upon this bill, as it did not contemplate the recession of the City of Washington, but only of the other parts of the District.

Mr. STANFORD had intended to have called up the resolutions for recession, but he had just received a letter from a number of the inhabitants of the District, wishing a short delay. There were also absent from the House several members who had taken considerable interest in the subject. For these reasons, he did not intend to call up the resolutions for two or three days.

Mr. EARLY was averse to a postponement. He thought an early decision ought to be made, to quiet the minds and soothe the feelings of the inhabitants, who felt a deep interest in the decision. Indeed, the members themselves had had their feelings excited in no inconsiderable degree. He hoped if the gentleman who brought the resolutions forward should forbear to bring them up, some other gentleman would do it for him.

Mr. STANFORD was induced to let the subject rest a few days longer, on account of those very feelings and interest which pervaded the whole body of the people. He would also prefer a decision by a full House, rather than by such a thin one as now appeared.

Mr. EARLY did not think that a thin attendance by the members was a good argument for postponement. If it was expected that every member should attend, he feared the public business would progress very slowly; but if the subject was entered upon now, and the resolutions adopted, they would have to take the shape of a bill, and it would be many days before the subject was finally decided, by which time no doubt the absent gentlemen alluded to would arrive.

Mr. LYON said the bill that was moved to be postponed had nothing to do with the recession, as it was not proposed to recede the city.

Mr. GREGG knew that the resolutions excepted Washington City, but he hoped that if a part of the District was to be receded, there would be found a majority for receding the whole. He was against the recession altogether, and so he should be till the question was decided against him. The business had been so long before the House, that he could not see any reason for further delay.

On the question to postpone the bill for incorporating the Washington Building and Fire Insurance Company, there were 51 for it and 42 against it; and the bill was postponed accordingly.

The House then adjourned to Wednesday.

THURSDAY, January 3.

An engrossed bill supplementary to the act entitled, "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill for carrying into more complete effect the tenth article of the Treaty of Friendship, Limits, and Navigation, with Spain, was read the third time and passed.

On a motion made and seconded to add a new rule to the standing rules and orders of the House, in the words following, to wit:

"A standing committee to consist of seven members, and to be styled 'the Land Committee,' shall be appointed, whose duty it shall be to take into consideration all such matters and things, touching the lands of the United States, as shall be presented, or shall or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House, and to report from time to time their opinion thereon; and also to report such alterations and amendments to the laws concerning the lands of the United States, as may become necessary."

The question was taken that the House do agree to the same, and passed in the negative. So the said motion was rejected.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, of the thirty-first ultimo, to whom were referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act concerning drawbacks on goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from the district of New Orleans;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported their disagreement to the report, and their agreement to all the amendments referred to them.

The House then proceeded to consider the said report and amendments of the Senate: Whereupon, the question was taken that the House do agree to the report of the Committee of the Whole thereon, and resolved in the affirmative.

FRIDAY, January 4.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on a bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to divide the Indiana Territory into two separate governments;" and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with an amendment, which was twice read and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be read the third time on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to authorize the Collector of the port of Philadelphia to act by an additional deputy; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

On a motion made and seconded that the committee appointed, the twelfth of November last, on so much of the Message from the President of the United States as "recommends an enlargement of the capital employed in commerce with the Indian tribes," be discharged from the consideration of the alterations and amendments necessary in the "Act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes," referred to them by a resolution of the House of the fourteenth of the same month, the question was taken thereupon, and resolved in the affirmative.

A motion was then made, and the question being put, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary in the "Act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers;" and that the committee have leave to report thereon by bill or otherwise,

It passed in the negative.

Another motion was then made and seconded to reconsider the vote of the House for discharging the committee appointed the twelfth of November last, from the consideration of the subject referred to them on the fourteenth of the same month; and, on the question for reconsideration, it was resolved in the affirmative.

On the question that the said vote of the House to discharge the committee, be rescinded, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill further to amend an act, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

A remonstrance and petition of the representatives elected by the freemen of the Territory of Louisiana, was presented to the House and read, stating certain objections to the system of government for the said Territory, as established by an act passed on the twenty-sixth of March last, and submitting thereon various matters and propositions to the consideration of Congress, which, they pray, may be adopted for the convenience and benefit of the petitioners and other inhabitants of the said Territory of Louisiana.—Referred to Mr. EPPES, Mr. LUCAS, Mr. CLAGETT, Mr. HUGER, Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. FOWLER, and Mr. BRYAN, to consider and report thereon.

A message from the Senate communicated to the House farther proceedings of the Senate relative to the impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The said proceedings of the Senate were read, and are as follows:

UNITED STATES VS. SAMUEL CHASE.

"Ordered, That the fourth day of February next, shall be the day for receiving the answer, and proceeding on the trial of the impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States."

"Attest: SAM. A. OTIS, Secretary."

Ordered, That the said proceedings of the Senate do lie on the table.

MONDAY, January 7.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to divide the Indiana Territory into two separate Governments," together with the amendment agreed to on Friday last, were read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELLIOT presented a petition from Barnabas Strong and sundry other inhabitants of Vermont, praying a grant of a tract of land six miles square, in the Territory of Indiana.

Mr. OLIN opposed this application, as being a speculation upon the public property of the Union, and hoped the petition would be rejected.

Mr. ELLIOT did not view the application in the samelight with Mr. OLIN; but were it the thing suggested, he thought still it might be suffered to go to a committee for inquiry.

On the motion to refer it to a select committee, there was thirty-seven yeas, and thirty-two nays.

The SPEAKER said the voters did not amount to a quorum, and having called in the members to their seats, the motion was put a second time, and there were forty-one in favor of the reference, and thirty-seven against it. It was accordingly referred to a select committee of three.

Mr. FINDLEY laid upon the table a resolution to be added to the rules of the House, directing the SPEAKER to call upon the chairmen of committees to report the progress they had made in the several items of business referred to them, every Friday morning during the residue of the session.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what alterations are necessary to be made in the laws for the disposal of the public lands Northwest of the Ohio, and that the said committee be authorized to report by bill, or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. MORROW, Mr. GREGG, Mr. GODDARD, Mr. STEPHENSON, and Mr. VAN CORTLANDT, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. OLIN moved the appointment of a select committee, for the purpose of considering the propriety of increasing the allowance made to the persons employed in bringing to the seat of Government the returns of the election of President and Vice President of the United States. The allowance made by law being two dollars and fifty cents for every twenty miles travel to Washington, and nothing allowed them for their return.

On the question to raise such committee, there were fifty-six members in its favor, and twenty-one against it. A committee of three was appointed.

REMISSION OF DUTIES.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom were referred the petitions of Benjamin Bailey, James Bogart, Jr., and others, citizens of the United States, and resident merchants of the City of New York, made the following report:

The petitioners have been sufferers to a large amount by a late distressing fire in the City of New York. They represent that they imported into the district of New York, various goods and merchandise, of a great value; and while they were still owners of such property, a conflagration took place, which destroyed their stores, with all, or nearly all, their contents, including the merchandise on which the duties were secured to be paid. They pray that Congress will authorize the Collector of New York to deliver up, or cancel, all bonds or other securities given by them for duties upon such part of the said goods and merchandise as were destroyed by the fire.

Repeated decisions on similar applications leave no doubt on the mind of the committee that it would be improper to grant the prayer of the petition. When any article is imported into the United States, and the duties thereon are ascertained at the custom-house, the amount forms a part of the actual value, and is an insurable interest: if it is afterwards destroyed by fire, or lost in the transportation, coastwise, from port to port, or in any manner injured or damaged, it has never been considered that the United States were bound to cancel the bonds entered into by the importers for the duties. The United States can, in no respect, be considered in the light of underwriters. When the duties have at any time accrued, they ought to be paid, and the importing merchant can have no greater right to call upon the Government for a return of the duties than he would to demand of the seller a diminution in the price, or to ask the possessor of his note or bond that he may be exonerated from the payment for any article purchased in the market, merely because the bargain was not advantageous, or because the merchandise was burnt or destroyed, which formed and constituted the evidence of value "received." It is with regret the committee make these observations, but they wish it to be generally understood by the merchants, that in no case could they deem it proper to advise the House to refund the duties upon merchandise destroyed by any accident whatever.

It is true the Treasury of the United States ought not to be enriched from the losses of private individuals, and that our revenue is chiefly derived from the duties on articles consumed in the country; but, when it is fairly considered that, to abandon claims upon the importers, would lead to numerous impositions; that if some were relieved from debts contracted in good faith, (although the articles on which those debts originated were actually destroyed) it might induce others to expect similar indulgences, without having equal claims upon the national bounty, and as there exists a strong necessity for preserving uniformity in these decisions, and as it cannot be reasonably expected that Congress should now deviate from a long course of practice, founded as it is on equitable and strict commercial principles, the committee recommend that the petitioners have permission to withdraw their petition.

The report was agreed to by the House.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on a motion "to recede to the States of Virginia and Maryland, the jurisdiction of such parts of the Territory of Columbia as are without the limits of the City of Washington."

Mr. STANFORD said it was his wish to make a few observations on the resolution now before the Committee, for the retrocession of that part of the District of Columbia which had been ceded to the United States by the State of Virginia, in support of the vote he should give—expecting that what was said on the first, would be generally applicable to the last resolution also. He begged leave, however, in the first place, to suggest that, in bringing forward the motion, he had not had any the least intention to take any step that should go to a removal of the Government. He trusted no gentleman of the Committee would entertain such an opinion of his views. Had such been his intention he would have preferred a direct motion to that effect.

As then both the resolutions together made but a single object—that of ceding back again to the respective States of Virginia and Maryland all the District of Columbia, except the City of Washington—he should, in the course of the discussion, consider it more incumbent on those adverse to the measure to show the original wisdom and utility of the provision in the Constitution, than on its friends. It would be enough for them to show its present evil tendency, and that it was an encumbrance no way necessary or useful to the General Government.

Upon a former occasion some question had arisen, and might yet lie in the way of some gentlemen, whether Congress, having once accepted the cessions of the States, had now the power of recession. On that head he had not, himself, ever found reason to doubt. By the third section and fourth article of the Constitution, "Congress has power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States;" and besides the eighth section of the first article, which assigns to Congress the exclusive legislation over this district, in all cases whatsoever," does not appear to come short of such a power. Like authority is also given, in the same paragraph of the Constitution, over all places purchased by the consent of the State in which the same shall be, "for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings." Congress, thus possessing the right of disposal, had exercised that right by an act passed two sessions ago, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to convey to the Salem Turnpike and Chelsea Bridge Companies a part of the navy yard at Boston. With it, will any one contend that jurisdiction did not also pass to the State of Massachusetts, whence it had been obtained? It certainly would by every fair and bona fide view of the circumstances. If, for instance, murder should be committed on that part of the turnpike which was formerly a part of the navy yard, could it be contended that such murder was not punishable by the laws of Massachusetts; that the General Government was the only competent authority to punish? He hoped otherwise. A like discretionary power of cession was also exercised, when Congress anticipated the ordinance, and transferred the jurisdiction to the people of the Northwestern Territory, which now forms the State of Ohio. It would be remembered that, at the time of the transfer, the United States held the exclusive jurisdiction of that territory.

But, Mr. Chairman, we have a case of recent date still more conclusive, as being more directly in point. The very term itself (cede) is used. In the second article of the late "Articles of Agreement and Cession with Georgia," after accepting the cession of Georgia, the United States go on to say, "and they cede to the State of Georgia 'whatever claim, right, or title they may have to the jurisdiction or soil of any lands lying within the United States, and out of the proper boundaries of any other State, and situated south of the southern boundaries of the States of Tennessee, North Carolina, and South Carolina, and east of the boundary line herein above described as the eastern boundary of the territory ceded by Georgia to the United States.'" It is worthy of remark Congress never even took exception to this act of cession, and interchange of cessions, as it respected the power of doing so—nor did the State of Georgia, though she had both a federal and State interest to serve upon the occasion, and had to pass a solemn act of ratification, and acceptance of such cession from the United States, for it made a part of her compensation for the Mississippi Territory. That State has, moreover, since extended her authority, and erected a county in the very territory thus ceded. Other cases might be cited of a similar exercise of power on the part of the General Government, but he must be allowed to consider the present as sufficiently conclusive and unanswerable.

As to the expediency of a retrocession, he did not know that much need be said. Every debate during the present session, in relation to the affairs of the District, was but an additional argument for the expediency as well as policy of the measure. Whole days had been lately taken up with local and unimportant matters, to the neglect of the greatest concerns of the nation. He did not think there could be found another district of country, of the same variety, not to say contrariety, of interests. There seemed, indeed, a perfect turmoil of contending interests, not possible to reconcile, and as impossible to legislate for in peace. He would ask, did it accord with the genius of the General Government to be thus occupied with this small portion of the country? Could it be supposed we should be able to get along with such an appendage? He thought not. With the exception of territorial jurisdictions, the powers of Congress were, as they ought to be, not of a local, but general nature; and yet with one local concern or another, within this ten miles square, Congress had been harassed with petitions, counter-petitions, and memorials, more than from one-half of the States in the Union besides. This fact would appear by a reference to the journals of the different sessions since the assumption of jurisdiction. But the time consumed in this way was not all; the existing government of the District formed annually no inconsiderable item of expense in an aggregate point of view. To this should be also added the expense of printing. Our journals are much enlarged, voluminous bills and other matters printed, which, no doubt, went far to swell the contingent expenses of the House, of late so justly complained of as enormous.

But, said Mr. S., over and above the consideration that the District of Columbia is no way necessary and every way expensive to the General Government—in fact, a kind of governmental nuisance that ought to be removed—there was another objection, still more serious with him, the people of the District were the merest subjects in their condition. If they held rights, they were not apparent to him in the Constitution. He believed all they held were those of courtesy. In the Constitution no immunity, no privilege, no political right, had been, in so many words, reserved to them. They had been specifically given away, consigned to the ideal convenience of the General Government, without a single specific reservation. This was not the case as to the people of the States. If he were told the people were content, and did not wish a change, that with him was a good reason why the motion should at once prevail. If twenty, or twenty-five thousand people had already become willing subjects, without wishing any share or control in their own affairs, such an example ought no longer to remain under our system of Government, and he trusted would not. He concluded by expressing a hope that the resolutions might be adopted.

Mr. SMILE rose in reply. He disclaimed any intention hostile to Washington remaining the seat of Government, and denied that the recession would have any influence upon it. Having elucidated the Constitutionality of the measure, he exhibited in strong colors the degraded situation of the people of the District, and the dangers which might hereafter arise from a continuance of it.

JANUARY, 1805.

H. OF R.

Mr. DENNIS.—Mr. Chairman : As a resolution analogous in all its leading features to those now under consideration, was submitted to the consideration of a former Congress, by a gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. BACON,) and as that resolution was put at rest by a very decisive majority, I had not expected that its ghost would have risen up at so early a day to haunt the people of Columbia, or to interrupt the deliberations of this body. That the gentleman who has offered these resolutions has acted from the best lights of his own understanding, and has believed the object intended to be thereby effectuated is both within the pale of our Constitutional authority, and politically expedient, it is not for me to question. To me, however, they appear unconstitutional and politically inexpedient, and I will moreover add, cruel, unjust, and tyrannical, in their operation on the people of this district.

In order to ascertain the extent of our power on the subject, we must resort to the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution. Here we find that, amongst other powers therein enumerated, it is declared as follows: "That Congress shall have the power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the General Government," &c. This clause contemplates, first, a place to be acquired, lying at the time within the jurisdiction of some of the States, but which was to be put out of their control and within the exclusive jurisdiction of the General Government. This was to be done in order that a permanent seat might be established, which should not be liable to be changed by Legislative caprice; and in order that the jurisdiction over the place in which its operations were to be conducted might be, like the Government itself, the property of the whole people of the Union, and free from the influence of any one of its component parts.

This appears to be as much a part of the Constitution, that you should always have this federal district, as that there should be a Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary department.

2d. It points out the manner in which this district shall be acquired, and the agents who are to be instrumental in the acquisition. The convention, on behalf of the people of the United States, who are the principals, appoint Congress the attorney in fact to receive the conveyance, and constitute the Legislatures of the States from whom the cession or conveyance is to be made similar agents to make it. The several agents have performed their respective offices, the district has been acquired in conformity with the authority given, the right to the property vested in the American people, and possession held of it by us, for their benefit, for whose use it was acquired. All the power which was given as to the acquisition of the territory has been exhausted, and no other power remains but that of exercising over it exclusive legislation. To explain and illustrate this subject to the most ordinary capacity, let me compare the transaction to a case in common life. If I give a man a power of attorney to purchase for me a tract of land, in a particular district of country, of a specified quantity of acres, leaving it to him to make the location, and he accordingly make a purchase, and I consent to the act, receive the conveyance, and take possession of it, can my agent afterwards make another choice, divest me of my right, and reconvey the property without my consent? No man will answer this question affirmatively; and yet it is clear there is a perfect similitude between the cases, and that Congress are agents acting in this case under a limited authority and confined in the exercise thereof to a specific object. That Congress are special agents, and not vested with a general power over every possible case is manifest from the whole tenor of the Constitution; and I will lay down in this instance a rule which has been generally recognised as the standard, by which to test the extent of Constitutional authority in any given case. It is, that Congress can exercise no power on any subject but what is expressly delegated and specifically enumerated in the Constitution, or necessary and incidental to the execution of the specified powers. What is their power in the present instance? To accept a cession and exercise over it exclusive legislation. Can you infer from hence a power of retrocession? To do so is at war with the amendment of the Constitution, which declares that all powers not given to the General Government are retained by the States or the people respectively. Was not the power confined to the acceptance of the district directed to be procured for a specific purpose, and when so acquired, to continue an object over which Congress, as a permanent body, might always have it in their power to exercise exclusive jurisdiction? Can you then claim the power of reconveying the district and receiving one as often as your caprice may dictate, or of divesting your successors of the same control over this district which we may exercise ourselves? The power is not expressly delegated, nor is it a necessary power to carry into effect any power given; for it will not be contended, but we may exercise all our powers and perform all our duties, and still retain the jurisdiction over the district.

It has been said that Congress and the Legislatures of Maryland and Virginia, being the parties to the contract, may, like all other parties, by mutual consent, dissolve the obligation. The premises might be admitted, and the conclusion does not follow. For it is not always true, and never so where the rights of third persons are involved, that the original contracting parties can dissolve the contract. If I draw a bill of exchange, and the drawee endorse it to a third person, it is not in the power of the drawer and drawee to cancel the obligation. This case will apply as well to the people of the United States as to those of the District of Columbia, whose vested rights are mutually affected by the proposed resolution. But surely the premises are incorrect, and this is to be regarded as a contract of the American people, and not the contract of Congress, made with the people of the ceded territory, that if they would consent to give up their property, and the States in which they lived would make the cession, Congress should accept it, and exercise over them exclusive legislation.

Again, sir, it is said that Congress are not imperatively commanded to exercise this power, but have an option to exercise it or not, at discretion. Be it so. But does this give the power to transfer its exercise to a foreign jurisdiction?

This district has been completely severed from Maryland and Virginia, and has been erected into two counties by the name of Washington and Alexandria, and forms, at this time, no more a part of the territorial limits of Maryland and Virginia, than of New Hampshire or Georgia; and you may by the same authority that you propose to reannex them to those States, unite them to Delaware or Jersey, and put the people, many of whom never were citizens of Maryland or Virginia, under the jurisdiction of the Emperor of Hayti.

"Congress shall have the power to exercise exclusive legislation," &c. What Congress? Is it the Congress of 1804-'5, or 1820-'50? if, indeed, the Union so long endure. Surely, sir, we can exercise no power which our successors may not also exercise on an object declared by the Constitution to be a subject of legislation for Congress; and if you should give up the exercise of the jurisdiction for the present, and repeal the act of assumption, your successors may repeal the repealing act and resume the jurisdiction; otherwise you may deprive your successors of all the powers of legislation. In the section in which the power of exercising exclusive legislation is given, is also contained, amongst other powers therein enumerated, the power "to coin money and regulate the value thereof," &c.—"the power of making a uniform system of bankruptcy," &c. These powers Congress may exercise or not; but can they vest in Maryland and Virginia, or any other State, the power of legislating for the Union on these subjects, and thereby deprive their successors of the exercise of these powers, should they hereafter deem it advisable to resume them? No, sir. Neither can we by any act of ours (nor can it be done in any way but by an amendment of the Constitution) divest our successors of an ultimate control over this territory, and of the right of resuming jurisdiction over it, which you in vain attempt to give way.

Then it may be problematical, at least, whether the States of Maryland and Virginia will consent to exercise powers, in consequence of this kind of Legislative deputation, over a people, not within their territorial limits, and who form no more a portion of the citizens of those States than of any other section of the Union? Why should they expend their time and money, and encounter those difficulties as your viceroys and mere tenants at will, which you are afraid to encounter yourselves? You might as well vest in Maryland and Virginia the exclusive right of legislating for Louisiana.

But, Mr. Chairman, I should be glad if the gentleman who proposed the resolutions, and who by the term recession and some kind of magical operations is to produce a re-annexation of this district to the States from which it has been severed, would inform me precisely what he understands by the term, and what is to be the result of the measure on the rights of the people of the district. I presume however, he expects, by the adoption of these resolutions, to reinstate them in all their former rights. Will this be thereby effected? Having been cut off completely by the Constitution, the acts of cession on the part of the States, and by the acts of acceptance in 1790, from their parent States, they will be in the same situation as a purchased or conquered people, and entitled to no other rights and privileges but such as their new masters may think proper to concede. They were, before you separated them from their parent States, a part of the sovereignty of those States and their rights secured to them by their respective constitutions.

But it will be said, you may annex a condition to the retrocession compelling Maryland and Virginia to reincorporate them into their respective political systems, with all the immunities and privileges they formerly enjoyed. Even then they are dependant for their rights, not on the constitution of those States respectively, but on compact and legislative promises. But you have already made one legislative promise, which you are about to violate, and where is the security that the legislative promises now to be made will not be violated again, especially as the very act which makes the new one, violates a former one, accompanied with greater solemnity? Sir, we have had some experience as to the difference between a people who have their rights secured by a constitution, and one who depends for that security on compact, in the people of Louisiana. By the treaty they were to be incorporated into the Union, with all the rights, immunities, and privileges of American citizens. We know the latitude of discretion and the various constructions which have prevailed, to deprive these people of the rights stipulated by the treaty. Suppose the States to whom you propose the retrocession to be made should assume a similar latitude, to whom are these people to apply for redress? They must invoke the aid of Congress, instead of appealing as before to the constitution of the State as a guarantee of their rights.

But, Mr. Chairman, are the people of the territory unworthy of a moment's consideration, and will their remonstrances against the measure be altogether disregarded? Let us take a retrospective view of the circumstances under which they were seduced from their parent State, and the manner in which they consented to dissever the civil and political bonds by which they were formerly connected. What induced them to alienate their native allegiance, and with a generous confidence to submit themselves to your authority? First, the Constitution held out a pledge and formed the basis of the contract, involving a promise, that if the people living in the district of country, which should be fixed upon for the seat of Government, would give up the rights possessed under the government of the States to which they belonged; they should forever remain under the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress. By the act of Congress accepting the cession, the territory received is declared to be the place fixed on for the permanent seat of the Government, and the States ceded forever the jurisdiction of the persons and soil within the same to Congress, for the purpose of exercising therein exclusive legislation. Finally, you assume the government, establish your own systems, and annul those of the States. Confiding in the premises, they gave up the control of their persons, and some of them divided with you their property. They came to you with one consent, and hailed your arrival here as the most fortunate epoch in the annals of their country—and now, will you set them adrift without deigning to listen to their prayers?

But all this is to be done to restore them to their lost liberty; to emancipate them from the shackles of despotism with which they are encumbered, and to elevate them from their degraded condition to the rank of freemen. These are very pretty theories, but like many other theories on the subject of the abstract rights of man, when pushed to their extent and everything made to bend to them in order to give them complete effect, are found to be in their practical operation oppressive and unjust. I deny, sir, that the people of this district are in that deplorable state of slavery which some theorists, imagine. They are entitled to, and are in the enjoyment of all the rights secured to the people of this country by the various restrictions on the powers of their governors. No man in this territory can be deprived of life, liberty, or property, but through the medium of the Judiciary department, operating in the same way, and under the same circumstances as in every other part of the Union. The clause relative to the independency of the judicial power, applies itself to the courts here as well as to any other court of the Union. But if it should not be so considered, since the new doctrine has been established, that the tenure of good behaviour in your judges is no bar to the omnipotency of the Legislative power, the people here in this respect have the same security for the independency of their judges and their fellow-citizens as in other parts of the Union. The principal difference between the people of this district and of the different States is, that they have no immediate and actual representation; but notwithstanding the importance of the right of representation to a people, generally speaking, and however correct may be the general principle, that a people cannot enjoy perfect freedom without it, yet, in a place situated as is this district, there is more of theory than of fact in the assertion that the people who are without it are in a state of civil and political despotism.

This being the seat of Government, where all the representatives of the nation are collected, and who, from the responsibility which they owe to their respective constituents and to the whole people of the United States, are under every moral and political tie to do justice, and to protect the rights and interests of the people here. Here every citizen of the district has access to every member, and he may personally communicate his wants, his wishes, and solicit his particular patronage of his interest; and instead of being confined, like a district of country in the remote parts of the Union, to a single member, who may not possess the talents to explain its interests to the Legislative body, the citizens of this place may make a selection out of the whole of the members to whom he may chose to confide his application. Like the seat of Government in all other places, without having any actual representation, this district will have more than its equal share of influence, and its weight will always be felt more sensibly in the Legislative Councils of the nation than the remote parts of the Union. Our theoretical philosophers, however, not only contend that in order to make these people free and happy, we must force liberty upon them, whether they will have it or not, but that even with respect to the conveniency or inconveniency of being governed by this body and the States of Maryland and Virginia, they are incapable of judging for themselves.

But is there no conveniency resulting to them from having all their concerns brought within the narrow limits of ten miles square? Is there no conveniency in having their own courts of justice at their very doors, instead of travelling to Richmond and Annapolis? It is an old-fashioned idea perhaps, but it is one which very generally prevails, even at the present day, that to bring justice home to every man's door, is a great political and civil blessing; and in this respect the people of this place enjoy an advantage which is unknown to any other people in the world.

The great advantages contemplated as likely to result from being represented in the Legislatures of Maryland and Virginia, and the powers of self-government which it is supposed may result from the measure, are merely ideal. What weight will the district on the Virginia side of the Potomac have in the large body of the Legislature of that State, when they will only form a part of the county of Fairfax, and have a share in choosing two members to the Assembly? The same question might be asked in relation to the district of country formerly comprehended in the counties of Prince George and Montgomery, in Maryland. They would be regarded with a jealous eye; a sort of aliens, who were forced, contrary to their remonstrance, to submit to their respective jurisdictions.

But the trouble of governing these people is urged as a serious objection; we certainly have had sundry applications and some legislation has been necessary to accommodate our laws and political systems to this new situation. But this has been, in a great degree, already accomplished; and, I believe, little more is now necessary to be done. And, with respect to the imaginary wants which have sometimes constituted the basis of troublesome applications, it is believed there is now prevailing a very general disposition to suppress them in future. This resolution, however, proposes to retain the city, and the same objection applies, and nearly to the same extent, to its government, as to the whole. The laws of this territory have been enacted; its systems established, and the officers appointed with reference to the whole; and it will require nearly as much legislation to accommodate your laws to the city alone, as will probably be requisite if the whole be retained. Lastly, I have another objection to these resolutions; because they go to dismember the plan of the territory, which was the favorite child of that illustrious man who may justly be denominated the political Father of his Country. This great and patriotic statesman, whose energetic and comprehensive mind viewed things on a grand scale, foresaw the necessity of bringing nearer together the Atlantic and Western divisions of his country. He considered this place, from the contiguity of its position to the western waters, destined to occupy, at some future day, that situation which would render it the great market for western supplies, and which would stand at one end of a great national turnpike connecting the Western and Atlantic frontiers. He knew full well the local jealousies which will forever exist, and which we know do exist, between places situated like Georgetown, Washington, and Alexandria. He foresaw that these local jealousies, if properly restrained, would, by the action and reaction which they would produce, operate as a general stimulus to the whole, and thereby become rather an advantage than otherwise to the general prosperity; that, by gradual approximation, these places would be brought together and form one great whole. This could only be effected by making the General Government the common centre around which these rival towns, revolving in their respective orbits, would revolve free from collision. But, put them under three different and hostile jurisdictions, three different centres of attraction would be formed; and in revolving around which these hostile bodies might meet each other, and mutual injury ensue. He knew that, by restricting the inspection of produce descending the Potomac, and coming from the west side of the river to Alexandria, Virginia might force all her produce by the City of Washington; and that, by a similar operation on the part of Maryland, all her exports might be stopped at Georgetown; that the destruction of the city and of all her prospects would be the consequence; and, therefore, the wisdom of the plan, as originally adopted, and to support which, free from dismemberment, under whatever pretext, I shall always contribute my exertions. To discourage local jealousy I have always thought desirable when likely to be carried to a pernicious extent, and have always determined to leave each place to the enjoyment of its own natural advantages. I beg leave to conclude by remarking upon one or two observations of the gentleman from North Carolina on the Constitutional question. He has produced some Legislative precedents respecting the transfer of navy yards, arsenals, &c. If these precedents were in point, having passed, sub silentio, they ought to have no obligatory force. But, I am not aware that Congress has ever done anything, in this respect, but to sell the right of soil in places acquired for such purposes, and it still remains a question if they do not retain the jurisdiction, if they choose to exercise it. That gentleman seems to make no distinction between the right of soil and power of legislation over it, though the one may be in one body and the other in another. I do not deny but you may sell the lots in the City of Washington, either to individuals, States, or other bodies politic, but I do deny that you can sell your right of governing it.

The next precedent adduced was the case of the compact with Georgia, and by which we acquired an extensive territory. Perhaps this may be considered as growing out of the treaty-making power, and it is not denied that the Government may acquire territory and jurisdiction over it, through the medium of the treaty-making power.

I trust, Mr. Chairman, I have shown, what I intended in the outset of my remarks to establish, that Congress are not competent to effectuate the object of the resolution; that if they could do it, it is not demanded by the general interest, and that it would be unjust and tyrannical, as it relates to the people here, to make the contemplated transfer.

Mr. SMITH supposed the Committee were now considering the resolutions of retrocession generally, previous to giving a separate opinion on the two resolutions before them. Under this impression, he would make one cautionary observation. He knew that it always had been, on all occasions, the practice of those opposed to the retrocession, to connect that question with another subject, wholly and totally distinct; that was the removal of the seat of Government from this place. If it was possible to separate these two things in the minds of some of the members of the present House, he was persuaded they would find no difficulty in restoring the inhabitants of this District to their natural, their political, and civil rights; a thing so desirable in a Government founded as the Government of the Union was founded, and as almost every citizen of the Union contended, for the sovereignty of the people.

For his part he never did, nor ever should, connect these two ideas. Advocate, as he was, for retrocession, he had no idea of removal. He would go further, and declare it as his opinion, that Congress could not remove the seat of Government honorably, nor of right, and he trusted Congress would never hereafter, feeling power, forget right.

Having made this observation, he would briefly inquire, whether the arguments of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. DENNIS) were well founded? If he is correct in stating that, under the Constitution, the Congress have no right to legislate on the present subject, there was an end of the business. If he thought with that gentleman, he would be the last man to vote for the retrocession; but, as he thought differently, he would assign the reasons upon which his opinion was founded.

The gentleman read a part of that section of the Constitution, which granted certain specified powers to the Congress of the United States. He wished he had read the whole, and shown that there was a particular restriction placed on this particular power.

For his part, he conceived this to be a general grant of power under no restriction. In the several grants of power, under the eighth section of the first article, there were three out of the eighteen that were grants with particular restrictions. All the rest were complete and full grants of power, and the eighteenth grant had relation to them without limitation; of course they had complete Legislative control over the seventeenth, respecting the exercise of exclusive legislation over the District of Columbia.

He here read over the whole of the eighth section of the first article, observing upon each, that Congress shall have power:

1. To lay and collect taxes, &c., but all duties, &c., shall be uniform throughout the United States. Here is a restriction. Congress have power to lay duties, but they cannot lay them unless they shall be uniform throughout the United States. So of imposts, and so of excises.

To raise and support armies. But, no appropriation of money for that use shall be longer than for two years. Here, although Congress may raise and support armies, they cannot order any money to be applied to that use for more than two years, however desirable or convenient a longer appropriation might appear to them to be.

Respecting the militia, they may provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, and governing the militia. But they can neither officer nor train them; that is a restriction, and the latter powers are reserved to the States.

The other powers, such as to borrow money, to regulate commerce, to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws of bankruptcy, to coin money, to fix the standards of weights and measures, to punish counterfeiting the securities and coins of the United States, to establish post offices and post roads—

To promote the progress of science and the useful arts in a prescribed mode; and this also may be considered as a restriction upon their general power, as they cannot give to science and the useful arts any other encouragement than by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their writings and discoveries.

They have also complete and exclusive powers to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court; to punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations; to declare war, and other consequent powers; to provide and maintain a navy; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces; to provide for calling forth the militia of the Union for special purposes only; perhaps this also may be considered as a restriction on the general power to call forth the militia.

And then they have the power given by the seventeenth grant, viz: to exercise exclusive legislation, &c., to the end of the paragraph; and to the whole is added, the sweeping clause, as it used to be called, which was formerly urged to give unlimited power to the General Government. The Congress have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof.

What, he asked, was the conclusion to be drawn from this view of the Constitution? Surely and fairly this: that Congress may of right exercise all the powers which are unrestricted, under their sound discretion, to promote the general welfare; then it is declared that Congress may assume the exclusive legislation of this district, or they may not. If, however, they do assume it, they have equal power to recede. Congress, in the exercise of its legitimate and Constitutional power, passed a bankrupt law and a naturalization law; on experience they were dissatisfied with their effects, and they repealed them. Was it ever imputed to Congress as a violation of the Constitution? No: there being no restriction, they felt themselves either free to act or free to refrain, as circumstances rendered the one or the other expedient.

He would, however, agree that gentlemen had thrown some obstructions in the way, which, though it did not touch the right of Congress to act, yet rendered the action a point of extreme delicacy. We are told we have no right to transfer a people satisfied with their destinies in life, to another Government, without their consent. The gentleman has gone upon the idea that we are about to injure these people. Why, if he thought this was the case, he should not any longer incline to vote as he had intended to vote. But if he conceived, as he did conceive, that so far from injuring these people by restoring to them the right of suffrage, and all the consequent rights of freemen, he was about to render them essential service, he should persevere in his object. That gentleman also finds the people here secure from injury under a Government over which they have no control, and in the choice of whose members they have not a vote; by observing that the Government of the Union can have no interest in injuring a people depending upon them for their laws and their protection.

This argument, if such it may be called, goes too far; it would apply to all other Governments, because it can be demonstrated that the best interest of all governments is to promote the best interests of their subjects. It is the interest of even despotic Governments; but does not experience teach us that these Governments often, nay, almost always, sacrifice these interests to their own whim, caprice, self-gratification, or to the villany and avarice of subordinate agents?

He denied the security which the people of this district had for their natural rights. Political rights they had none, and they depend upon Congress from time to time for the civil rights which indulgence might afford them. What advantages then did Congress receive by retaining the jurisdiction proportioned or equivalent to the disadvantages? Was it that half their time was occupied in deliberations productive of no one satisfactory measure to the people they meant to befriend? Was it that so much of the money of the several States of the Union was expended uselessly at this place? He was confident no individual would sacrifice his time in this way, nor expend the money of his employers on such objects; and what was wise in private life would be politically right in public. He, therefore, believed it the reverse of good policy in the American nation, to retain the jurisdiction of the district.

On the point of expense he would add one idea; he deemed it enormous. Congress spent near half their time in legislating for ten miles square at the rate of $1,400 per day; at that ratio what would be the expense of legislating for the extensive territory of the United States, or even what would be a proportionate expense of legislating for a small State?

Let gentlemen stop for a moment and contemplate the subject in this point of view, and ask themselves, individually, would their own State agree to such an enormous expenditure under any circumstances than those of absolute and uncontrollable necessity. He was satisfied, not a member on the floor would accede to such a monstrous measure. If, then, no State could be justified by its individual representatives, he would ask for the arguments whereby the Representatives of the United States were to justify themselves to their constituents!

Why then retain this exclusive jurisdiction? We do not know their situation; we are strangers or sojourners here; we have not, therefore, their feelings. But restore them to the parent States, and they will be admitted to the full participation and enjoyment of every principle which elevates the prosperity and happiness of America over every other nation on earth.

It is said that dangers may hereafter happen, that the freedom of debate and deliberation may be overawed by the inhabitants. He admitted it to be possible, but the day was remote indeed. There was more danger to be apprehended on the other side. Congress, possessed of arbitrary power over this district, might grow infatuated with that power, and when the people of the district grew numerous, it was more probable that they would be called upon to assist in pulling down the citizens of other States to their miserable condition. It was the nature of envy to destroy what it could not reach.

He expected that gentlemen opposed to recession would show that superior advantages were likely to accrue from retaining the jurisdiction, or that on conviction they would join with him, and agree to adopt the measure of a total recession, which for himself he was in favor of doing.

Mr. EARLY.—Mr. Chairman, the resolutions which we are now called upon to decide, possess a high degree of importance, not only from their object, and the consequences likely to result, but also from certain principles which have been contended for, as applying themselves to the subject. In the outset of the discussion we are met with objections upon Constitutional principles against our right. We have been told by the people of this district, that we cannot recede the territory of which they are inhabitants, without their consent; and the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. DENNIS) has told us to-day that the proposed recession cannot be made without the consent of the people of the whole United States.

It is certainly desirable that all questions of this nature should receive a solution from the principles and practice of our own governments, without having a resort to foreign sources. But much I fear that the condition of the District of Columbia is one of a nature so peculiar to itself, that no such solution can be found. For it is impossible to conceive that the principles of a government whose essence is right, should be found to apply to the situation of a people stripped of all right.

The proposition that the consent of the people of this District is necessary to give validity to an act of Congress, having for its object a recession of the territory, carries with it the resolution of itself. It proves too much. The same reason by which they maintain this proposition, would go to prove that their consent was necessary to give validity to any act of legislation over them. That Congress possess the power of exclusive legislation over them, cannot be denied. We exercise, and we are authorized so to do, a power over all their rights of life, liberty, and property. And there cannot be presented to my mind a greater absurdity than to say the consent of the people of Columbia is necessary to any act in relation to them, when they are stripped of all rights of self-government.

I know, sir, that a distinction has been made between the right of legislation, and the power of transferring that right to others. And whilst it is admitted that the Congress of the United States possess themselves an exclusive right of legislation over the District of Columbia, it is denied that this right can be transferred to the States of Maryland and Virginia, without the consent of the people who are to be affected by the transfer. Of those who maintain this proposition, I would inquire by what authority was the cession at first made by Virginia and Maryland to the United States? Was the consent of the people who were to be affected by the transfer, then deemed necessary to its validity, and if so, how was such consent obtained? I have heard it argued that the people to be affected, were component parts of counties in the two States, and as such had a representation in the Legislatures of those States, through which their consent was given. I ask where is the proof that their consent to the cession was so given. For anything that appears, the representatives of those counties voted against the cession acts, in which event the will of the people of this District was, so far as the same could be in that way expressed, directly opposed to the measure. And for the sake of illustration I will suppose the fact to have been so, and ask gentlemen whether the acts making the cession were on that account invalid? I take upon myself the risk of saying, that no one will answer affirmatively. If so, the doctrine is reduced to this dilemma—

JANUARY, 1805.

ma, that a cession of the District of Columbia cannot be constitutionally made without the consent of the inhabitants thereof, but that such cession may be made in the face of their express negative.

The position of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. DENNIS) and his reasoning to support it have not had weight on my mind. I cannot conceive how the people of the United States are parties to the compact, so as to make any consent on their part necessary. The only parties, in my opinion, are the Congress on the one hand, and the States of Maryland and Virginia on the other. These parties negotiated and formed the compact; the said parties can undo it.

But be the reasoning of the people of Columbia and the reasoning of the gentleman from Maryland ever so correct and well founded in the abstract, I still have a conclusive answer, that it cannot apply to the case. No reasoning drawn from the principles of free governments can apply to a case, where the people are disfranchised of all rights. The inhabitants of this District are in every sense the subjects of Congress, and Congress are their masters. This is not only the theory of the Government exercised here, but in my opinion that theory has in a recent instance (the case of the Alexandria charter) been put into rigid practice. It is my wish, Mr. Chairman, to put an end to this disgraceful state of things; a state of things exhibiting the monstrous phenomenon of a country where the principles of freedom extend to the remotest extremity, whilst there is a despotism at the heart.

If precedents were necessary, they could easily be adduced. The gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. STANFORD,) has already cited several; some before, some since the adoption of the Federal Constitution. The one most recent is directly in point: it is the convention between the United States and Georgia. In this instance it is a fact, that a tract of country inhabited by a considerable population, was transferred by the General Government to Georgia, and is now incorporated with that State. The gentleman from Maryland has endeavored to evade the force of this precedent, by saying that the compact was entered into under the treaty-making power. The gentleman is incorrect as to the fact. The convention was made by Commissioners appointed under the authority of a special law of the United States on the one hand, and a special law of the State of Georgia on the other hand. It remains to examine the expediency of the proposed recession.

If no positive good can be proved to arise from the existing state of things, that of itself would with me be a reason amply sufficient to justify the adoption of the resolutions upon the table. But, sir, in my opinion, it is easy to demonstrate, not only that much positive evil does result, but that much more will probably result from the retention of the district. The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. STANFORD) has forcibly represented the evils arising from the load of business which is thrown upon us from this fruitful source. He has well stated the total impracticability of our legislating with any correctness for those with whose interests and concerns we are entirely unacquainted. Need I call to the minds of gentlemen the recollection of that which they are in the daily habit of witnessing—the collision of so many rival and contending interests? Need I call to their minds a very recent scene, in which the sensibilities of this House were so strongly excited in the discussion of a question relative to a part of the district? Need I call to their minds, how much the order and tranquillity of the House was invaded by the presence and anxiety of the opposing parties? If these things happen in the present infancy of our territorial government, what evils may not be anticipated when with increase of numbers we shall have an increase of interests, wants, pretensions and antipathies? When disappointment shall increase discontent, and we are engaged in the discussion of a territorial party question? The language of petition may be converted into the language of menace; and where now we have a peaceable people laying their complaints at our feet, we may have a mob brandishing their weapons at our heads.

Of a certain part of the people of this territory who have expressed to us their enmity to the resolutions, it may with propriety be asked why they are desirous of continuing to live under the exclusive Government of the United States; why should they wish to continue subject to a Government whose laws they endeavor to obstruct? Why wish to continue under a system of things, where they not only refuse to execute the laws themselves, but do all in their power to render such an execution by others, disgraceful? These inconsistencies remain for themselves to reconcile.

There is another point of view in which this subject deserves to be considered. It is in its relation to the Executive officer of the General Government. Mr. Chairman, I am not by nature jealous. I believe I am not enough so. When I shall have counted more years and have seen more of human nature it is not improbable I may be more disposed to suspect the correctness of human motives than I do at present. But I have seen enough to convince me that the best prayer which was ever prayed, was that against being led into temptation. The most effectual means of steering clear of temptation is to avoid opportunity. All example teaches that a military force at the command of an active, ambitious, and unprincipled leader, is the most dangerous foe to liberty. I know, sir, that faction and rebellion have also had their share in fettering the human race; but faction and rebellion generally carry with them their own cure. The military of this district are subject to the orders of your President. Sir, you may not always have a President whose principles will be a safeguard for the correctness of his actions. He is to judge of the occasions proper for calling the military of the district into the field, and the plausible pretext of preserving order, or guarding the Government from insult or injury, may array a military force around these walls. Put the case of a contested Presidential election, and the incumbent in office a man of military genius, insinuating, bold, and unprincipled. The military force of the District is at his command, the officers appointed by him. Gratitude, patronage, emolument, all those principles which operate most strongly with a soldiery, are arrayed on one side and opposed by that weak thing the amor patriæ on the other. This House, on whom the Constitution has devolved the right of settling the choice, may, under the same pretext of preserving the public order, be surrounded by the whole military force of the district, and then farewell freedom of decision.

Upon the subject of the city, I wish to be distinctly understood. There is no gentleman in this House who wishes more for its prosperity than myself—none who would more resist any attempt to unsettle any of the existing establishments within it. I feel it to be the duty of this Government to nurse it by every aid within their power. Let us, sir, give permanency to our station within it, and give the inhabitants the right of governing themselves. But I believe for myself, that we shall witness no prosperity or settled confidence here until we strip ourselves of the District. I believe the district is a dead weight about the city, which if not shaken off, will, sooner or later, bury the whole in ruins.

Mr. EPPES, with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SMILIE,) considered the question of receding the Territory of Columbia as entirely separate and distinct from a question to remove the seat of Government. He did not understand the particular connexion between the two questions. He believed that the seat of Government would be as permanently fixed here if the jurisdiction of Congress extended only over the soil covered by its public buildings as if it embraced any given number of square miles. All that the National Legislature wants here is accommodation. Assembled at this place for purposes of general legislation, the exercise of a local sovereignty over a few square miles is neither beneficial to the nation nor interesting to Congress. The right of legislating for persons around us, whose local interests we do not feel or understand, cannot attach to this spot the Representatives of the nation: the exercise of this power by Congress cannot attach to this spot the nation itself. The public convenience and interest fixed our Government within this territory: the public convenience and interest can alone continue it here. The permanent seat of our Government depends, not on the extent of our powers over the country around us, but on the will of the nation. Whatever might be the feelings of other gentlemen on this subject, he had no hesitation in declaring, that, although he was in favor of receding the Territory of Columbia, he should never feel himself authorized, as a Representative of Virginia, to vote for a removal of the seat of Government.

In the observations he should make on this subject, he was willing to pursue the course taken by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. DENNIS,) who had set out with declaring that he considered receding the territory as unconstitutional and impolitic. He would examine these two questions; and, first, the Constitutional right of Congress to recede the territory. If the words of the Constitution were, that Congress shall exercise exclusive legislation over the territory, there would be no doubt but that, like every other part of the Constitution, they must be obeyed. Whatever inconvenience might attend the exercise of this power by Congress, if, by the words of the Constitution, it was positively enjoined as a duty, we could not shrink from its performance. The words of the Constitution are, that "Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such district of country, not exceeding ten miles square, as may by cession of particular States become the seat of Government of the United States." What do we understand by the words "shall have power to exercise?" Not that Congress shall, but that Congress may, exercise exclusive legislation over this District, precisely as she may exercise any other of her delegated powers. By the first clause of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, by another clause to borrow money, and by other clauses various other powers, which certainly may or may not be exercised, without a violation of the Constitution; as, for example, if Congress was never to lay a tax—was never to borrow money—was never to lay an excise, or pass a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcy—it could not be contended that the Constitution was violated because she did not exercise these powers; yet, in all these cases, the language of the Constitution is, "Congress shall have power." Nor did he suppose, if Congress were never to exercise exclusive legislation over this territory, it could be contended the Constitution was violated; because this power, like all others given under the different clauses of the eighth section, may or may not be exercised, as the public exigencies shall require. None of the clauses are mandatory. The National Legislature is, in every case, left to determine whether the public good requires the exercise of a particular power. If, then, Congress may never exercise this power, and not violate the Constitution, it follows that the actual exercise of exclusive legislation over this territory is not an essential part of the Constitution, but that this clause, like all others in the eighth section, is a mere grant of power. If, then, this clause, which gives to Congress exclusive legislation over this Territory, is only a grant of power, the use she may constitutionally make of the power depends on the extent of the grant; and we may fairly inquire whether the power over this territory is conferred on Congress, in terms so unlimited as to authorize its transfer to any other person or persons.

In order to decide this question, it will be necessary to ascertain what is the power conferred on Congress over this District by the terms exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever? Is it the same limited sovereignty which she possesses over other Territories of the United States, which have not become States? Or is it an absolute sovereignty? In countries where no written compacts or charters exist between the people and those who govern, sovereignty is defined to be the "power of making laws." A right to dictate the rule of action in all cases, subject to no control, is certainly a complete sovereignty. In this country, in the individual States, the sovereignty resides in the people, and the Legislative power extends only to certain specified objects, fixed by their constitutions. Under the General Government, also, the Legislative power of Congress, so far as it respects the confederated States, extends only to certain specified objects, fixed by the Constitution, and all powers, not expressly given, are reserved by the States or the people. In speaking, therefore, of the Legislative power of a State or of Congress, so far as it relates to the United States, we mean nothing more than the power of making such laws as are authorized by the constitutions of the different States, or of the United States. He supposed, however, that the terms "exclusive legislation," contained in the article which gave to Congress jurisdiction over this territory, had a very different meaning from the mere power of making laws. They did, in his opinion, vest in Congress absolute sovereignty over the District. He had no doubt but that the words were selected for that purpose. An absolute sovereignty is the power to pass laws without any limitation as to the exercise of that power. Let any gentleman attend to the clause which gives to Congress jurisdiction over this district of country—Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever. What is the limitation to this power? Is there any but the moral rectitude of Congress? Have the people of this territory any charter of rights? If they have, where is it to be found? Can they claim the Constitution of the United States as their charter of rights? They are not parties to that compact. If they are at all parties to that compact, it must be as citizens of Maryland and Virginia. Whatever rights, as a portion of the States of Maryland and Virginia, they might have acquired, by being citizens of those States, at the time the Constitution of the United States was adopted, were certainly lost by the acts of cession of Maryland and Virginia. By that transfer they lost their chartered rights under the State constitutions of Maryland and Virginia, and also the rights they had acquired under the Constitution of the United States, as portions of the States of Maryland and Virginia, at the time of its adoption. By the acts of cession, their right of property only is secured; their particular rights vested in Congress. And the people of this territory have as good a right to claim as their charter the State constitutions of Maryland and Virginia, as they would have to claim the Constitution of the United States. Their rights, under the Constitution of the United States, were acquired as citizens of Maryland and Virginia, and their rights, as citizens of those States, are lost. It is not, therefore, in the Constitution of the United States we are to look for the limitation of the power of Congress, as it respects this District. Is it in the people of the District we are to look for this limitation? Have they any share in our elections? Are we, in any shape, responsible to them? Are they represented on this floor? Do they pretend to claim or exercise any political rights? If then, an absolute power to legislate without control, is an absolute sovereignty, and there is no control, either by charter or in the people of this territory over the power of Congress, as it respects this District, it follows irresistibly, however galling it may be to the people of the District, that as complete sovereignty over them as human language can give, is vested in Congress. That her will is the law of the District of Columbia, and that the political privileges of these people depend solely on the moral rectitude of the National Legislature. The doctrine is strengthened by the opinion which has always been entertained, that the framers of the Constitution intended to vest Congress with absolute powers within this District. And, indeed, he had often heard that one of the most conspicuous friends to this monster in the Constitution, declared that liberty ought not to exist within the ten miles square; that one great officer and one great prison was the only government which ought to be established within this devoted Territory. If, as he had attempted to show, an absolute sovereignty over the territory was vested in Congress, it followed, as a necessary consequence, that it might be transferred. The United States had sanctioned the principle of transfer where the sovereignty was complete, because they had acquired a valuable territory under such a transfer.

But there was another point of view in which this question might be placed. It was generally admitted that, under the terms "exclusive legislation," Congress had power to exercise, or provide for the exercise, of Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary powers within this District. Some of her powers she must necessarily delegate, because she cannot herself exercise them. If she can transfer a portion of her sovereignty, she might, he presumed, establish a government for the territory, and vest it in the Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary powers. If Congress has a right to establish a government for the territory, in whom does the Constitution require her to vest her powers? She may vest them in one or more persons, or in one or more corporations. There is no limitation on the exercise of this right if Congress possesses it at all. If she can transfer her powers over this territory to a government within the ten miles square, what prevents her transferring these powers to a government without the ten miles square? Has not Congress the same right to transfer her sovereignty over the part of the territory bordering on Maryland, to that State, and her sovereignty over the part of the territory bordering on Virginia, to that State, that she would have to transfer the same powers to a government within the District? The same clause which gives her exclusive legislation, is the only limitation on her power. By establishing a government for the District, Congress would be divested of her exclusive legislation. By a transfer to Maryland and Virginia, Congress would be divested of her exclusive legislation also. The extent of the power exercised in the two cases is substantially the same.

There was another point of view in which this question might be placed. This ten miles square is a portion of territory within the United States. It is admitted that the people of this territory possess no portion of the sovereign power. The sovereign power over this District, then, is either absolutely in Congress, or Congress possesses a portion of the sovereignty, and the residue is in the people of the individual States or in the States. If Congress possessed the entire sovereignty she might transfer, as he had shown. If Congress possessed only a limited sovereignty within this District, it must be derived from the second clause of the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution, which declares "that Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States." Or, in other words, Congress possesses the same power over this territory which she has over other portions of territory which possess population without being States. In the exercise of her ordinary territorial power, Congress, during the last session, attached the territory of Upper Louisiana to Indiana. If Congress had a right to attach that territory to Indiana, why may she not transfer this territory, divide it as she did the territory of Louisiana, and attach a part to Maryland and a part to Virginia, with the consent of those States?

If the view he had taken of the powers of Congress over this District was a correct one, it would not be necessary to say much on the expediency of a measure interesting to the people of the District, to the people of the United States, and to the National Legislature. The people of the District, in returning to the bosom of the respective sovereignties from which they have been torn, will be again restored to the rights of freemen. Instead of a miserable dependence on the will of Congress, their rights will stand on the firm basis of a written charter; their industry be placed under the fostering care of men elected annually by themselves, possessing their feelings and interests. They will quickly experience the difference between that legislation which flows from a cold sense of duty without responsibility, and the active and zealous exertion excited by a common interest, and kept up by proper responsibility. To doubt the beneficial effects of such a change to the people of this territory, would be to call in question the great principles of representative government. It is true that a gentleman from Maryland has told us that the rights of a people are sufficiently secure, if those who govern them have no interest in injuring them; and that the advantage of a legislative body of their own might be questioned, because too much legislation was worse than none. The people of America have ever deemed the right of electing those who govern them essential to freedom. The time, he hoped, would never arrive in this country when this important privilege shall cease to be valued. He should not attempt to demonstrate a first principle. If the gentleman from Maryland had any doubts as to the blessing of self-government to a people, he would recommend to him a perusal of the history of American Independence, in which he will find the patriot whose shade he had invoked, devoting the best period of his life to toil and danger for the establishment of that principle. But we are told that the people of this District deprecate a change, and prefer political slavery to a full participation of American rights. Do we believe this to be a fact? If it was a fact, it was to his mind a conclusive one in favor of receding the territory. If this people have already so far degenerated as to attach no value to the blessings of self-government, and prefer living destitute of political rights, they are already fit instruments for tyrants. It is time for them to take a new lesson in the rights of man. Let us restore them to a situation in which if they cannot acquire the feelings of American citizens, their detestable principles may not infect the great mass of the community. He did not, however, believe that this was the sentiment of a majority of the people of this District. He did not believe it was the fair sentiment of any portion of people in any part of the United States. He had no doubt if the question was fairly put to the great mass of any community: had you rather have your persons, your property, and rights, protected by men elected by yourselves, or live dependent on men in whose election you have no voice, over whose power you have no control? that the answer would in every instance be in favor of possessing these important privileges. What had been viewed as the sentiment of the District, he considered only as the opinion of a few landlords, who having embraced the erroneous idea that receding this territory would affect the value of their property, had misled and enlisted on their side the people against their substantial interests. By what process of reasoning this people had been induced to believe that enlarging their political rights would lessen the value of their property, he did not know. It was a species of logic he wished not to understand. As one of the Representatives of the United States he should consider himself bound to extend to these people the privileges which every American ought to possess. He had always been taught to believe that the privileges attached to property constituted an important part of its value. That in enlarging human rights in a district of country, you enlarge also the means of happiness, and give additional value to the property of the citizen.

The people of the United States will be freed from the expense of legislating for this District. The time destined for national purposes will be employed for the good of the nation, and not in local legislation for a territory, whose internal regulations must in time require more laws than all the general interests of the Union. They will restore to the rank of American citizens a portion of people doomed under momentary error to political degradation. Their system of protection and rights will become uniform throughout the United States, and our people be relieved from an example odious to freemen, and dangerous to liberty, of a political society existing in our country destitute of political rights.

As it respects the National Legislature, he had always thought this exclusive jurisdiction, while it devolved on them great additional labor, was not calculated to afford them any additional security or freedom in their deliberations. The legislative body of a free country must stand on the broad basis of public opinion. In the faithful discharge of their duties, they require not the hand of power to protect their deliberations. An honest and enlightened Legislature, pursuing faithfully the public interest, will find in the attachment of a grateful people that safety which would be in vain sought in powers derived from parchment. Deserving the confidence, and possessing the support of the nation, the National Legislature can command respect in any situation. Let them forfeit that confidence, and if their jurisdiction, absolute and uncontrolled, embraced the whole continent instead of this ten miles square, the frowns of an indignant people would reach them. It is not by surrounding your Capital with men destitute of political rights that you can exclude the voice of freemen. The sanctity of parchment power used as an engine of oppression, is not known in this country. The virtue of the Legislature is its only shield. It is that alone which insures the support of the nation. With the confidence of the nation we possess its sword and its purse, and can command the respect due to the representatives of a free people. Under whatever aspect he viewed the question, whether as it respects the people of the District, the nation, or National Legislature, he had no doubt as to the expediency of receding the territory.

The Committee now rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, January 8.

THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on a motion of the twenty-ninth of November last "to recede to the States of Virginia and Maryland the jurisdiction of such parts of the Territory of Columbia as are without the limits of the City of Washington."

Mr. SOUTHARD.—Mr. Chairman, I should have contented myself with giving a silent vote on this question, had it not been for the strong impressions on my mind that more is intended than expressed in the resolutions now on the table. It is not two years since two resolutions were introduced to this House similar to those now under consideration, with this distinction, that they went to include the City of Washington with the other parts of the District in the transfer to the States of Virginia and Maryland.

I believe it to be the object of some members not only to recede the branches of the District contained in these resolutions, but likewise the city. If the doctrine so strongly contended for, that Congress has a right to transfer or recede, be once established—take the first step, and you may as easily take the second. I have no desire to call in question the sincerity of the mover of these resolutions, nor of many who support them; yet there are others who wish a recession of the whole territory.

This subject involves two questions: First, whether Congress has a Constitutional power to make a retrocession of this District to the States of Virginia and Maryland; and secondly, whether it be good policy. As to the first, Mr. S. said, he had strong doubts on his mind, as to the rightful power of Congress to recede or transfer.

The members of the Convention who framed the Constitution of the United States looked forward to a day when it would become necessary to fix a place which should become the permanent seat of the Government. By reference to the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, we see it clearly expressed that Congress shall have power "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district, 'not exceeding ten miles square, as may by cession 'of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the 'United States.'"

This article, with all others contained in that instrument, after publication for the consideration of the people of the United States, was adopted, and became a part of the Constitution. In pursuance of this object, Congress, on the 16th of July, 1790, passed an act, entitled "the cession act," in the words following, to wit:

"That a district of territory, not exceeding ten miles square, to be located as hereafter directed, on the river Potomac, at some place between the mouths of the Eastern branch and Connogochegue, be, and the same is hereby accepted for the permanent seat of the Government of the United States."

Congress accepted a cession of ten miles square for the express purpose, and on the express condition of exercising exclusive legislation and jurisdiction, and this, too, agreeably to the spirit and meaning of the Constitution and law, thus forming a compact, which Congress has no right to violate. All the States in their Legislative capacity, and the people of the United States, including the inhabitants of this territory, are bound by this compact, which compact is as strong as the Constitution itself.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are told that there can be no Constitutional objection to the retrocession. The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. STANFORD) contends that this district stands on the same footing as a plot of land purchased by the Government for a navy yard, from the State of North Carolina, for the United States. Sir, there is no analogy in these cases. In the purchase of land for a navy yard, the Government becomes the proprietor of the soil, and in such case jurisdiction and soil are inseparable; so also in the cession by North Carolina the right of soil passed with the jurisdiction. The case under consideration is widely different; the right of soil passed not with the jurisdiction; the right of legislation only being vested in Congress. Congress cannot, therefore, transfer the right of soil, nor the inhabitants, to the States of Virginia and Maryland, nor to any other State or nation, without their consent.

Gentlemen complain that Congress are too often called to legislate for this District; and why? Is it not owing to the neglect to enact laws really necessary to the internal regulation of the city?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SMITH) laments the degraded situation of the people of this District, in being unrepresented, and in a state of absolute despotism. Mr. S. said, he did not view them in such a degraded situation as stated by that gentleman; he considered them represented as the Convention and as the people of the United States intended they should be, and as they themselves expected to be. Were the inhabitants of the territory in the degraded state so much lamented by gentlemen, or were the people of the United States once persuaded that a portion of their fellow-citizens were really thus oppressed, we should have complaints and memorials from every quarter of the Union. But sir, we have no such complaints—they are satisfied, and I am entirely so.

We are told, and the alarm is given, that there is great danger of despotism springing up in this District; that the seeds of despotism are already sown; that the germ of aristocracy already begins to appear; and they beg us to "reflect upon certain conduct of an ambitious leader."

Sir, I apprehend no evil, dangerous to the liberties of the country, flowing from this source. Suppose, for the sake of argument that an ambitious leader, or a corrupt President, should rise up, could he, with a military force, confined to the militia of the District, give laws to the Union? Can the territory afford sustenance to an army? Hence, the idea of danger, held up by the gentleman, is predicated on the corruption of the Legislature, and a total dereliction from the principles of liberty. While the Legislature shall remain pure and uncorrupt the liberties of the people are safe. Without the aid of the Legislature, the Executive, in this case, is impotent. He can neither raise nor feed one soldier. But if the dangers and difficulties pointed out by the advocates of these resolutions be real, why do they not apply at once an effectual remedy? Carry them into effect, and the principal evil will still remain. It is lopping off the branches while the stock remains. You still retain all that, in my opinion, can ever prove dangerous to the liberties of this country. The gentlemen concede that Congress must still legislate for the city; this acknowledgment destroys one half their argument; for it will require nearly as much time to enact laws for five miles as for ten miles square.

The advocates of these resolutions call on us to prove the advantages derived by Congress in exercising exclusive jurisdiction over this territory? If they are dissatisfied, and wish to make innovations on the regulations established by the Constitution and the laws, the burden lies on them to prove that injury is done to the citizens by our exercising this Constitutional power. But, sir, this is a task too hard for them to perform.

Mr. Chairman, I will now make one observation as to the policy of the measure. I consider it bad policy at any time to make unnecessary innovations upon established laws and customs. Why in this case, I ask, set the Government afloat? Or, why destroy the confidence of the citizens in their Government? Our constituents are happy in the enjoyment of their freedom and liberties, the people of the District are also happy and satisfied with their present situation, and I cannot, nor do I wish to agitate the public mind without a just cause. Under the impression that, to adopt these resolutions would produce much evil, without doing any good, I shall vote against them, and hope they will not pass.

Mr. FINDLEY observed that, after what his colleague (Mr. SMITH) and others had said in favor of the resolutions for a retrocession of the territory, exclusive of the city, he had not expected to hear any objection to the resolutions on arguments derived from the Constitution; the resolutions for receding the territory to the States who had made the original cession might, he thought, have been fairly combatted, on the ground of expediency; on this ground only did the resolutions before the Committee rest. He gave the credit, however, to the gentlemen opposed to the resolutions, for their ingenuity in taking the most tenable ground, though not directly involved in the question, but he acknowledged it was indirectly connected with it. If we had not a right to retrocede, the Representatives of the United States undoubtedly might decline to exercise jurisdiction, for, whatever the rights of the people were, the Legislature must be free to act or not to act. If this is not the case it could not be a sovereign Legislature, Congress itself, in this case, would act by compulsion.

As the constitutionality of the question had been discussed by every member that had spoken on the subject, he would endeavor to be very concise in his observations on that ground. The power vested in Congress by the Constitution to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over a territory not exceeding ten miles square, was evidently one of those powers left to the discretion of Congress, such as the power to regulate weights and measures, to make a bankrupt law, &c. Congress had enacted a bankrupt law, and had repealed it again. They had attempted to regulate weights and measures, and had dropt the subject after trial. Congress had accepted of the ten miles square, had found the exercise of the jurisdiction inconvenient, and were now proposing to make a recession thereof to the States from which it had been ceded. Mr. F. said, he knew of no well founded argument that would apply, on Constitutional ground, against doing so, but what would, with equal force, have applied against repealing the bankrupt or the exercise law, or any other law enacted under Constitutional authority.

JANUARY, 1805.

H. OF R.

He said that, though a member of the ratifying convention of Pennsylvania, and of the Legislature of that State, and of Congress since that time, he did not remember ever to have heard it suggested that Congress was not vested with the same discretion in this case as in others, expressed in similar terms. He had, indeed, of late, heard several members say that Congress was obliged to establish a permanent seat, &c., but, in taking a review of the Constitution, he found no such expressions. The word permanent was not in that instrument, nor any other expression that made it the duty of Congress to establish a permanent seat, more than to establish a permanent excise, direct tax, or bankrupt law. The word permanent, however, he found in an act of Congress, but certainly not authorized by the Constitution; and this present Congress had equal power to make a retrocession as that Congress had to accept. He said it was not necessary to prove to the members of this Committee that laws, in their nature, were not permanent, but changeable with circumstances, and that Congress had by the Constitution equal powers with any other Congress. That, from the express words of the Constitution investing this power in Congress, and from its analogy to the investiture of other powers, no argument could be drawn against the resolutions, that every argument of that kind he had heard was not taken from the words of the Constitution, but from constructions given to it, which he conceived the words would not bear, and which would have a ruinous effect applied to other powers expressed in similar words. That he did not consider himself bound by what other gentlemen fancied the Constitution meant or intended, but by what it said.

Mr. F. said the argument had taken a different turn from what he had expected. The resolutions did not propose to remove the seat of Government. Far from it; none of those who advocated the resolutions proposed to remove the seat of Government; they all agreed in declaring they had no such intention; he also declared that whatever its inconveniences were, he had no such intention, nor did he know a member who had. But he wished to be candid; he was of opinion that Congress had authority to remove, when and where they pleased. The Constitution did prescribe restrictions on the exercise of several Legislative powers, but it prescribed no restrictions on the power of exercising exclusive jurisdiction over a territory not exceeding ten miles square, or over forts, arsenals, &c. Of several of these he had no doubt Congress would make a retrocession. He had no doubt but a retrocession would be made of whatever of that kind Congress had received from the State of Pennsylvania, at Pittsburg, Meadville, Presqu'isle, &c., when they ceased to be useful to Congress, and became inconvenient to that State. These subjects are, by the explicit language of the Constitution—a language which cannot by fair exposition be perverted—vested without restriction in the Legislative discretion of Congress, in the same unqualified terms as the power in question. Mr. F. said twelve amendments had already been made to the Constitution, and, if it was found that Congress was imprisoned in a situation they did not approve, or where they could not act freely or safely, and that they were constrained by the Constitution to do so, another amendment could and would as easily be made; therefore, even admitting though not granting, the Constitutional obligations, the property of the residence of Congress is not permanent. Its continuance must depend on the will of the people of the United States. Other considerations are a greater security. In the city many have laid out large sums of money on their confidence in Government, and the Government has laid out very large sums of money to provide accommodations, and must lay out more, for that purpose. And, notwithstanding some present inconveniences, he said he believed it was nearly as central and capable of being made as convenient a situation for the seat of Government as could be found. From this it was evident that justice to the city and policy with respect to the United States, combined in preventing a removal of the seat of Government. Justice and policy, he said he thought were a better security for the citizens than even the word permanent, if it had been in the Constitution, which all who would be at the pains to read, would find it did not contain.

Mr. F. said that he had detained the Committee longer in discussing the constitutionality of the resolutions than he had intended, and would endeavor to be short on the question of expediency, though he thought it was on this ground only it ought to have been contested. He said he had heard the members who were in favor of the resolutions called on to prove the injury or inconvenience arising from legislating for a territory of such extent. This was done as an evasion of the question. On the other side, it was required to state the advantages of rejecting the retrocession. Waiving the inquiry, on which side of the question the burden of the proof lay, Mr. F. said he would state some of the disadvantages. Every session Congress, since it came here, he found, had spent a large proportion of their time in making laws for different portions of this territory, and, from his own experience, he knew that, for one important part thereof, (Alexandria,) they had made a law last session. They were told this session they had been imposed on; they had repealed the law of last session and made another, and it was asserted they had been imposed on again. He said he could enumerate more instances, but he would only state that Congress now sat at the expense of above $1,000 per day. He said, if members would recollect how many days had been spent every session legislating for this territory without giving satisfaction, and consider how many more probably may be spent, they would not inquire for the inconveniences arising from governing the territory, but would be prepared to state the advantages; of these he knew nothing, nor had heard anything.

Mr. F. said it had been frequently asked what more difficulty there was in legislating for ten miles square, than for the city alone. In answer to this, he asked those members to recollect how many applications had been made, how many laws have been passed, how many days have been occupied in legislating for other parts of the District than the city. He would ask what the people would lose by being receded to the States to which they formerly belonged, and what they gain by the members of Congress, who have no common interest with them, nor even acquaintance with them or their peculiar circumstances, and liable to be imposed on by every one with whom they converse, legislating for them? He said that it had not been made to appear that the people would suffer any loss by agreeing to the resolutions, and that, as it was indubitably evident that the public would gain advantage, he hoped they would be agreed to. He had early observed that there were nearly as many interfering interests in this ten miles square, as in the whole United States; the members of the Committee would recollect that several of the most tedious debates, accompanied with the greatest irritation, that had taken place this session, arose from such subjects.

H. OF R.

JANUARY, 1805.

He said the gentleman from Maryland had alleged that if Congress had a power to agree to the resolutions on the table, they had a power to transfer it to the Emperor of Hayti; he conceived this observation required very little reply, the question was a recession, a restoration of what we had, not about making an original transfer. Mr. F. said he was delighted with the gentleman's (Mr. DENNIS) anticipation of the prosperity of this place, that all the parts would become one city, and have but one interest, that consequently the subjects of legislation would be fewer and less difficult. He asked in such a case what would be the consequence? In anticipating the pleasing progress of population and wealth, he supposed that at some period not far distant, the population would be equal to that of Philadelphia, which with a small district around it at present had three members on this floor, and supposed at a more distant period it would have a population equal to London or Paris, which if they could be represented, would be entitled to from twenty to thirty members. Are we to presume that in such a case the people would be contented to have no voice in their own Government? The people of all the States have constitutions for their own internal government, and are represented in the Government of the Union, these they consider as privileges highly advantageous. He would not say what rights the people of the district in question did enjoy, but he was confident in saying that they did not possess the invaluable rights he had just mentioned. He knew of no good reason why the people are not equally capable of governing themselves as the people of the several States, and he was surprised to observe several members who were but a few days since zealous advocates for extending the right of suffrage to the people of Alexandria, even when the majority of the people of that district were petitioning against that extension. If the population increased agreeably to the expectations of the member from Maryland, a recession, or something to that amount, must take place; it is inconsistent with all our ideas and all principles of Government to have such a mass of people in the centre of the Union without any Constitutional rights, without any voice in their own Government, and without having a common interest in supporting the General Government or in protecting the United States in the possession of those privileges of which themselves enjoy no share.

Without this, they could never be represented in either House of Congress, or vote for a President: let their number be ever so great, they will have no independent Legislature to enact laws for the election of members of Congress or appoint Senators, no Executive to issue writs for supplying vacancies.

Mr. F. added, that those who contemplate so great an increase of population and wealth, ought to prepare early for such an event, by making an early retrocession. He did not, however, for himself, believe the population of this district would increase with the rapidity suggested. It probably, with the name of a city, may be but a respectable village like the Hague, the seat of Government in Holland, a country where large commercial cities are numerous. The Hague, though seated near the sea, has never become a commercial city; that this might be the fate of the city wherein we sit he thought probable, not only because commerce had already taken its seat in other situations equally convenient, where every political privilege is enjoyed, but because he could not believe that any great number of citizens of the United States set so little value on the rights of freemen as to exchange those rights for the pecuniary advantages arising from the seat of Government, and in such as set so little value on these privileges he had not great confidence. The United States had given a sufficient pledge for the continuance of the seat of Government in this place; they had laid out large sums of money, and were continuing to do so, and had thereby encouraged others to do so, and no other situation was thought of or could easily be agreed to; therefore, the inhabitants would have equal advantages after the retrocession as they had at present, with the addition of enjoying the privileges of a Republican Government, and the rank of free citizens; therefore, being fully convinced that Congress was not restrained by the Constitution, he thought every argument derived from expediency was in favor of the measure.

Mr. BOYD said, that, although some gentlemen had left the constitutionality of the proposed measure out of the question, he was not satisfied any more on that point than he was of its expediency. The Constitution was to him the polar star by which his course through the sea of politics would be regulated. The Constitution had been formed by a convention composed of delegates from the several States of the Union, and was afterwards adopted by State conventions, on behalf of themselves and the people. He had been a member of his State Legislature, when they passed a law ceding a part of their territory, well knowing that if Congress did accept it, by the Constitution, they must and would exercise exclusive legislation over such district. He was well aware at that time of the consequence of accepting a district of territory not exceeding ten miles square, as laid down in the section so often alluded to; and he did believe that that consequence would be, that Congress must exercise exclusive legislation whenever they accepted the ceded district. The idea of recession was not taken up at that time. The States of Pennsylvania, Delaware, New Jersey, Maryland, and Virginia, made offers of cession under the terms of the Constitution. A partial cession was accepted by Congress from Maryland and Virginia. If a new disposition is to be made of this district, he did not see why Congress might not convey it to any of those States which had proffered to comply with the Constitutional suggestion, and receive from the same another territory in lieu thereof. This statement he made merely to show the absurdity of recession, as it had presented itself to his mind.

We are asked to recede this territory on account of the difficulty of legislating for its inhabitants. The same arguments would apply for the recession of the ceded territory of Georgia or Louisiana; their interests are also too indistinctly understood; their distance too remote for our legislation. But no gentleman would act on such an argument in those cases. In his opinion, it would be equally improper to act in the case now before the Committee.

It has been said that the City of Washington would be the germ of aristocracy in this country. He did not apprehend such an effect. It would be recollected that Congress had the power of self-defence; they had the power of the militia to suppress insurrections; they had not that power under the old articles of Confederation, yet they resisted every menace, every attempt to introduce aristocracy. Look at New York, at one time the residence of 40,000 British troops, with additional support, to the amount of 80,000. Were these adequate to drive the people of America into the toils of monarchy and aristocracy which beset them! Neither that force nor any other could effect such an end, so long as the Constitution remained, and the people preserved their virtue. But, if he was in favor of a system of aristocracy, he would be in favor of laying hands upon the Constitution, and changing it from day to day, till it had lost all that symmetry and connexion which endeared it to the hearts of Americans. In that event, the people would throw it from them in disdain, and then would be the time to propose another system. For his part, he considered the Constitution a sacred instrument, which ought not to be lightly touched. Considering it thus sacred, he should ever consider it his duty to elevate his voice against its violation, and that, he believed, would be one of the consequences of the present measure.

Mr. NELSON meant to lay his opinion before the Committee, because it appeared to be the habit of members to assign reasons for voting, without expecting to make any impression upon others. He considered the present question of the greatest magnitude to the United States generally; and of peculiar importance to his immediate constituents.

He thought he should be able to show, to the satisfaction of every member present, that the removal of the seat of Government, which would be the consequence of recession, was not only inexpedient, but also unconstitutional. If he was successful in making out his point, that it was unconstitutional, he presumed the question of expediency need not be argued; the measure would be set at rest, and not a member would be found to give it his support. But, if he should prove unfortunate in this respect, which however appeared to his mind as true as that two and two make four, he might have reference to the question of expediency.

Previous to an inquiry into the constitutionality of the proposed project, he would just observe that constitutions themselves were things of recent date. Before the American Revolution the word itself was never fully understood. Lexicographers who attempted to define it never could agree. There was no practice whereupon to try its meaning. No power on earth had a Constitution before the American States. True, England has long boasted of possessing a Constitution, and so satisfied were her statesmen and politicians of the reality of this imaginary being, that they have extolled it to the skies. The glorious Constitution of England, her pride, and the envy of the world! Fine words truly; but where is the thing itself to be found? Is it reduced to writing? No. Who has seen it? No man. Is it known to any man? If it be, no two agree as to what the boasted Constitution of Britain is. How different, how honorably different, is the American Constitution! With us it is reduced to writing. It is in every man's hand; it is known to the whole world, and every citizen agrees in its true and legitimate meaning. He would take this opportunity of expressing his voice, and of holding up his hand in resisting the doctrine of construction and inference formerly set up, whereby the tenor and effect of that invaluable instrument was likely to be changed. He knew that artful and ingenious men might twist and turn, and make it, like the word republican, to mean anything or nothing, as best suited their nefarious designs. But this declaration and these attacks upon the body of that sacred work, were introduced by insinuating and artful lawyers, aided by the villany of judges, and accepted by men employed in the administration of our public and most important national affairs.

He saw nothing to justify the present motion. Gentlemen had attempted to show, not only its policy, but also its constitutionality. He, however, could not discover any words on that paper that warranted the project in the most remote degree; perhaps it had escaped his search; but he rather suspected gentlemen relied more upon an inference than on either the letter or spirit of the instrument itself. But he here would repeat, that no man was authorized to infer or construe, from the Constitution, any other thing than what the plain sense of plain words would justify.

He again declared the measure unconstitutional, and would prove it. The eighth section of the first article authorized Congress to exercise the power of exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district as may become the seat of the Government of the United States. Now, he asked, if this section did not mean that the district ceded by particular States, and accepted by Congress, should ever thereafter be considered and deemed to all intents and purposes the permanent seat of Congress, what did it mean? For what other purpose could the words be used? The Constitution, to be sure, does not say that this particular District shall be the permanent seat of the Government; but it says Congress shall have the power of legislation over such district as may, by cession of particular States become the seat of Government, wisely leaving it to Congress, who had more time and leisure to contemplate the place proper for the purpose, to make the selection. Congress have done this, and the people have sanctioned the measure. The Constitution prevents the removal; true, Congress have powers to pass laws for the regulation of the general concerns of the nation; but, in this case, the Constitution has set up a barrier which neither we nor our successors have any right to overleap. The acceptance of this territory by Congress is the final seal to the compact, and no power on earth can annul its binding obligation. We cannot lay our unhallowed hands upon the instrument in order to cancel its injunctions.

Congress could not, under the terms of the Constitution, assume the jurisdiction at several times; it is made but one act, and that being done, cannot be undone. It must, therefore, be considered preposterous to propose to recede a part of the jurisdiction and retain a part; yet, such is the intention of the second resolution on the table.

Will gentlemen contend that the Constitution may be altered on this subject, in virtue of the fifth article? He did not deny the sovereign power of the people to make, alter, or abolish the constitutions of their Government; but until that was done, the Constitution must remain as we find it, and we would look in vain for the power of recession in that instrument.

It had been argued, and well argued too, and the argument is difficult to answer, that the people of this District are placed in a degraded situation. That they have no immediate voice in the choice of Representatives; that their civil and political rights are prostrated at the feet of Congress. He did not, however, acknowledge that the argument, in its utmost extension, was perfectly correct, and the reason was, that the Constitution, which every member is sworn to support, provides a guarantee for a republican form of Government, and under this solemn tie, he was inclined to believe that Congress could never exercise a despotic authority, or tyrannize over the inhabitants of the District, any more than they could over the citizens of the other States. If Congress were to assume a power of passing oppressive laws, for instance, say over Georgia or New Hampshire, the delegation from those States on this floor would give the measure an honorable opposition; but their voice would be no more than a drop in the ocean. What is a representation of three or four, nay of half a dozen members, to compare with the numbers composing the present House? He believed the people of the District might depend upon the rectitude of Congress, and he placed a greater reliance on this ground than on all the abstract reasoning he had heard.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SMILIE) had said that retrocession was one thing and removal another; that the two things were distinct and not necessarily combined. He trusted that the gentleman was sincere in saying he did not wish for a removal; but Mr. N. could not separate in his mind the two ideas. If Congress violate the Constitution by agreeing to a retrocession, what security have we that the next step may not be a further violation, and followed up by a removal? It is true it would be a breach of contract, and perhaps produce the destruction of a thousand families, now in the possession of a comfortable competency. But he would ask, is this honest? is it right? He could consider the present proposition in no other light than as a stepping stone to the removal altogether.

The gentleman on his left (Mr. EARLY) had said that the people of this District were ceded to Congress without their consent, and infers that Congress have the right to recede them without consulting their wishes. Mr. N. considered this a fallacious representation. The people of the territory had their Representatives in the Legislatures of Virginia and Maryland at the time that the acts of cession were passed. He did not deem it material whether those individual members voted for or against the cession: because, in republican Governments, the will of the majority is the will of the whole people.

He here recapitulated the several points he had endeavored to maintain, and apologized for the length of time he had detained the Committee, and concluded with a declaration of his wish that the Committee would give to the resolutions a decided and prompt negative, in order that the question might be put to rest forever; that the people of the District might go on with their improvements, in full confidence that the public faith is pledged to them for the support of the privileges they enjoy under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Mr. ELMER said he agreed with the gentleman from Maryland who had just now been up, that the question before the Committee is an important and weighty one; but it seems that it is not of itself sufficiently weighty for that gentleman's shoulders, for he has loaded it with much extraneous matter. Had the gentleman proved to my satisfaction either of the positions which he promised to demonstrate, I would not have troubled the Committee with any remarks on the subject, but would have joined him in voting against the resolutions on the table. But, unfortunately for me, I have, by everything that has been said, become more convinced of the constitutionality and expediency of carrying the resolutions into effect.

Mr. Chairman, it has not been contended, and indeed it cannot be contended but what the power of exercising exclusive jurisdiction over this territory was left discretionary with Congress by the Constitution. That they might or might not assume it optionally. It only remains then for us to inquire whether the act of acceptance was of such a nature as to lay Congress under the necessity of continuing the exercise of that power which they have constitutionally assumed. In order to prove this, gentlemen have blended the act for fixing the permanent seat of Government here, with the assumption and exercise of the right of legislating over the inhabitants of the Territory. The latter results from the former, but it does not necessarily follow therefrom. This is clear to my mind from the words of the Constitution, and from the proceedings of Congress under it. Among the enumerated powers granted to the National Legislature is that of exercising exclusive legislation over an extent of territory not exceeding ten miles, which, by the consent of the States to which the jurisdiction might belong, should be established as the seat of the General Government. But, let it be remarked, that Congress have the power to exercise this exclusive legislation, which, like all all other powers granted, may or may not be exercised. If the seat of Government had not been fixed here, Congress could not have legislated particularly over this territory; but the seat of Government being fixed here, they may exercise that power or not, at their option. And the proceedings had under the Constitution, relative to the subject, confirm the position. In July, 1790, an act was passed fixing the seat of Government on the Potomac, but no act of legislation was passed, until the year 1801. It is therefore clear that this may be considered as the permanent seat of Government, and yet the jurisdiction of the territory reside in the States of Virginia and Maryland, as heretofore. But, a gentleman from Maryland told us that the cession and acceptance of this territory was in the nature of a contract, in which Congress acted only as agents or trustees of the people of the United States, and therefore it could be receded only by their act. The allusion, however, to a contract, is by no means striking, nor applicable in every particular. It is altogether a political transaction, at least so far as relates to the right of exclusive legislation, and bears very little affinity to a contract between individuals in society. Indeed, the people of this territory, if we may trust to the account of their proceedings printed in the public papers, have given up the point, of Congress being obliged to legislate exclusively over them. One of the objects of their association, it appears, is to obtain the right of legislating for themselves; and surely if Congress may delegate that power to a body within the territory, they may transfer their right of jurisdiction over them to the States of which they formed a part, and to which they belong.

Having, therefore, a clear right to legislate exclusively over this territory, or not, it is only necessary to inquire whether it is proper and useful to exercise it. In my opinion it is altogether improper. There might be some reason for delegating that power by the Constitution, but I can perceive none for exercising it; nay, to my mind it is a power that ought not to be exercised but upon the most urgent necessity. It is an excrescence of the body politic—a kind of government very foreign from the leading features of that which forms the basis of our social compact. The general principles of our Government are the wisest and best that the ingenuity of man ever yet devised. They are the boast of every American citizen, and the admiration of the whole world. Under this Government I hope and believe the United States will long continue to be flourishing and happy; and that her example will instruct, and tend to ameliorate the condition of the inhabitants of all the nations of the earth. We have most happily combined the democratic representative with the federal principle in the Union of the States. But the inhabitants of this territory, under the exclusive legislation of Congress, partake of neither the one nor the other. They have not, and they cannot possess a State sovereignty; nor are they in their present situation entitled to the elective franchise. They are as much the vassals of Congress as the troops that garrison your forts, and guard your arsenals. They are subjects, not merely because they are not represented in Congress, but also because they have no rights as freemen secured to them by the Constitution.

They have natural rights as men, and moral agents; they may have some civil rights constructively secured to them by the Constitution; but have not one political right defined and guaranteed to them by that instrument, while they continue under the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress. I have not heard any gentleman pretend to point out any sentence of the Constitution that secures them against arbitrary and despotic domination—that says to Congress thus far may you go in your Legislative acts and no farther. As Americans they may, perhaps, petition Congress, and there is no doubt the ears of the members will be open to their complaints; but they refrain from granting their most reasonable requests, and I don't wish to see such an uncontrollable power in operation. But, say gentlemen, the Constitution does not give to Congress the power of receding the jurisdiction of the territory, and they are not disposed to exercise a constructive power. I do not comprehend this language. I know some philosophers speak of negative power, but in my mind this is speaking incorrectly, and means nothing less than a powerless power. This is precisely the case as to the subject under consideration. Ceasing to exercise the power vested by the Constitution is but a negative, and wants no specific grant of power. Congress may now exercise legislation over this territory exclusive of the State Governments to which it formerly belonged; but with the consent of those States they may waive that right, and exercise only concurrent jurisdiction over them, in common with the people of all other States. But some gentlemen say, why annex them to Virginia and Maryland, rather than to any other of the States? The answer is plain, because they belonged to those States, because they are contiguous to them, and because by forming a re-union with them, they will be restored to their former rights, privileges, and habits. As integral parts of States they will have rights which are defined and guarantied to them by the Constitution; and then will our federal edifice be composed of homogeneous and proportionate parts, without any excrecence to mar its beauty.

A notion seems to be entertained by many of the inhabitants of this city that, by adopting these resolutions, we shall affect the rights of private property. If I believed this, however much I dislike the principle of exclusive jurisdiction, such is my disposition to foster this city and promote its prosperity, that I could not at present give them my support. But if I should speak from my experience in life, I should say that, by throwing off the jurisdiction of the other parts of the territory, and confining the fostering care of Congress to the city, would increase the value of property therein. This, however, may be theoretical, but it is more probable than the contrary; and by a recession of the whole territory, it cannot be rationally concluded that the value of property would be materially affected so long as the Government should remain at this place, and that I trust will be for ages. On the whole, believing it to be strictly consonant with the principles of the Constitution, and that it will promote the interest of the people of the United States and of this territory, to carry the resolutions on your table into effect, I shall, from a sense of duty, give my voice in favor of them.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD said the object of the present motion was, he supposed, to make a permanent recession of the two parts of this District, one to Virginia, and the other to Maryland, retaining the City of Washington. If this was really the object, there could be no doubt but it went to operate a change of the seat of Government. This he would endeavor, in as few words as possible, to demonstrate. The eighth section of the first article authorizes Congress to assume the exclusive legislation over a district not exceeding ten miles square, &c. The States of Maryland and Virginia ceded a district of ten miles square, or any lesser quantity, and Congress accepted a part from each State, making one district, to become the seat of Government of the United States. From this statement, it is apparent that the territory, or district, of Columbia is the seat of Government, and not the City of Washington. If, then, you recede the territory, you recede the seat of Government, although you reserve the City of Washington. He asked, then, whether this did not substantially go to remove the seat of Government? After you have receded two parts of the district, can a district be said to remain? If it does not remain, your seat of Government is gone, and gentlemen are justified in connecting the idea of removal with that of recession. Indeed, he felt surprised at the declarations made by gentlemen on this floor, that the recession had no connexion with removal, and if they thought it had, they would abandon the measure; yet, nevertheless, they give the resolutions their warmest support.

He was not prepared to say that Congress had no right to exercise the powers of recession and removal; but he did not think they were prepared to act upon those questions at the present day. He, however, acknowledged, that events might arise to make a removal necessary, but nothing of the kind had yet occurred. There were some inconveniences in residing here, but the members knew them, and they are lessening every day. If, however, gentlemen are not satisfied with the accommodation, and think that a justifiable ground for removal, they will vote for the motion, if they can get over the Constitutional objections, which had considerable weight on his mind.

It was very clear to him, that the Convention which framed the Constitution intended and designed to establish a permanent seat of Government; that the Constitution fully and effectually provides for that object. The circumstances which gave rise to the measure are too recent, and must be too fresh in the minds of the members of this Committee, to render it necessary or useful for him to detail them at this time. Now, whether the Convention accomplished the object they had in view, the Constitution would decide; and whether the object had been accomplished by the cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, the laws will decide. But whether it is wise or expedient to destroy a work on which so much wisdom, time, and money, had been expended, the gentlemen forming this Committee will decide.

The Constitution declares that Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district as may, by the cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States. What is the import of these terms, but that there shall be a permanent seat of Government? not a temporary one—not an estate for years or lives, but forever. These considerations induced the States of Maryland and Virginia to cede a territory, and Congress to accept it, with a view of making it the permanent seat of Government. The Constitution never contemplated more than one seat of Government. If this is a fair construction of the Constitution, how is it possible for gentlemen to advocate a removal? But it is said that the law assuming the jurisdiction might be repealed, as is the case with every law passed by this body. He did not think that this general maxim extended as far as some gentlemen seem to suppose. Among the enumerated powers given to Congress, there were several not liable to repeal; at least the repeal could not affect the acts consequent on them. They have power to borrow money on the credit of the United States. If money is borrowed under your law, can Congress repeal it? They may establish a uniform rule of naturalization, but can they take from a citizen, who has become such under that law, his right of citizenship, and reduce him again to an alien? So they can and may make and repeal a bankrupt law—they have done so—but can they repeal the effect it has had on those who have been discharged from their debts under it? They cannot.

Congress might have refused to accept a cession of this District—whether it was right or wrong to accept it is not the question—but having accepted, Congress have given the inhabitants a lien upon their justice, and they cannot, by a repeal, destroy any of the effects produced by the public confidence on the value of property within and near the District. But if this Congress were to adopt the resolutions, what would be the consequences? Is it contended that a future Congress could not hereafter assume the exercise of exclusive legislation, even if the two States should agree to accept the recession? He believed no gentleman would contend this point; and if Congress may hereafter assume the jurisdiction, we do nothing more than merely tie up our own hands. He saw no occasion for this, as he had not seen, felt, or understood the inconveniences complained of.

Much had been said of the disgraceful state in which the inhabitants of this District are placed; they are considered by some gentlemen as vassals or slaves. Now, he was willing that the people should judge on this point themselves. If they are satisfied to remain under Congressional legislation, he should not do anything to diminish that satisfaction. That they were satisfied, he inferred from the increasing population. He heard of no considerable emigration from the District; he heard of none flying to that country of liberty, across the Potomac. On the contrary, they were satisfied with the portion of freedom which they enjoyed in this place; that was fully evinced by the petitions and memorials on the table, praying Congress to continue to exercise legislation over them.

Mr. G. said, he repeated again, that the people were the proper judges of their own situation, and he would leave them to judge for themselves. He was not for forcing upon them his notions of liberty or political happiness. He said it was true Congress did not derive much advantage from sitting here and exercising exclusive legislation; but the people, perhaps, might; and that, perhaps, would console them for such deprivations as gentlemen had conceived in the warmth of a strong imagination. But, although Congress had not as yet derived much advantage from their exclusive legislation, the time may come when it will be all important for Congress to have the sole jurisdiction over the territory in which the public deliberations and conclusions are conducted. The time has been, and it is not impossible but it may be again, that Congress have been driven from the walls within which they were sitting. He knew nothing so likely to prevent a renewal of such an outrage as keeping in their own hands the right of sole and exclusive jurisdiction.

There were doubts entertained of the constitutionality of the measure of retrocession, and if gentlemen doubted, it would be much safer not to act on the subject than to risk the breach of the solemn obligations they had entered into at that table. He thought the weight of the argument on the expediency preponderated on the side he had advocated; and, from the most candid view of the subject, he was inclined to recommend the rejection of the resolutions; at all events, he should give them his decided negative.

Mr. CLARK.—The question before the Committee is truly of considerable importance, not only as it respects the constitutionality but the policy of the measure. He was sorry he had not the talents requisite for a full and complete investigation of so great a subject. Bred to an occupation purely professional, he had been led more to the study of detail and practice, than to abstract theories; hence it was, that, engaged in that laborious pursuit, he had no time and less opportunity of studying the diversified objects of political science. Thus circumstanced, he approached this question with extreme diffidence and cautious circumspection; the infraction of the Constitution was to him a source of alarm, and however great the object or brilliant the achievement, he stood appalled at the prostration of that Constitution he had always held in an estimation that approached to reverence.

But, on reflection, he was convinced that Congress were not about to violate their oaths, as had been insinuated, by the adoption of the present motion. He considered them in the exercise of a legitimate authority, and he would endeavor, in a brief manner, to examine whether they had not complete Constitutional power to make a retrocession. If he was capable of demonstrating this point, he trusted, he need not go further. But, it was necessary he should, in order to ascertain whether the present was the proper time, and the resolutions the correct mode? In doing this he had no prejudice to gratify or caprice to indulge; a stranger to the place, a stranger to the people, he had no motive to action but the unbiassed result of his own opinion.

He should not, however, look into the Constitution for sections wherefrom to draw a constructive power on this head; he was not one of those that collected power from implication, and if the authority is not expressly given, he would not assume it. The eighth section of the first article gives to Congress the power of exercising the sole and exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever.

What is the appropriate meaning of the word "exclusive" as here used? It implies more than the debarring and shutting out all other possible powers of legislation, and, when taken in connexion with the after, and immediately following words of the paragraph, it vests the absolute and uncontrollable power in Congress, free from any restriction; there is no possible case in which it cannot legislate. The Constitution declares Congress shall legislate in all cases whatsoever. But gentlemen say there is a case in which Congress cannot legislate. Aware of this absurdity, a distinction is attempted to be drawn between legislating for inhabitants of the District and for the District itself. But if it be established, as I think it has been, that Congress is here omnipotent, if you will allow me the expression, the conclusion in both cases (admitting the distinction, which can by no means be done,) is the same; in one case, the retrocession will mean nothing more than a cessation from legislation, accompanied with a desire that it may be resumed by the States; in the other, it will be a complete transfer of the District. In this sense it must be considered; the very words go the whole of this length. It is given to Congress, and not to the people; it is a complete investiture, boundless and indefeasible; and this is a full answer to the argument of gentlemen that the power is held in trust and not absolute.

But, if gentlemen are not satisfied with the conclusions from the eighth section of the first article, surely they will not contend against the express terms of the second paragraph of the third section of the fourth article.

There it is declared that Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States. Let gentlemen look at this section, and compare it with that part of the eighth section of the first article, which declares that Congress may exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings. The words "like authority," in this part of the paragraph, have a direct reference to the words "exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever," and mutually throw light on each other.

But the question, so far as it relates to the constitutionality, has been already settled by the practice of Congress, in the cases mentioned by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. STANFORD,) and ably commented on by a gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. EARLY.) Yet gentlemen say, that those laws passed sub silentio, and the principles not being discussed, the precedents are not in point. This, however, admits their force, and either shows that every member was satisfied that Congress possessed the power, or it argues a criminal remissness on the part of those who doubted the Constitutional power of Congress to effect that object. He was not inclined to infer the latter, especially as the former part of the statement obviated all the objections he had heard.

He would go a step further, as he thought the acts of cession from Virginia and Maryland would give a solution of the present question; they appeared to him to have themselves the seed of their own destruction sown. We are told that the power of retrocession or of cession, is not expressly delegated to Congress in the Constitution. This objection, he thought, however, had been fully refuted, but if the power is necessarily possessed in the complete and uncontrollable authority of Congress over the District, he would ask gentlemen to point out the clause in the constitution of either Maryland or Virginia, which gave their Legislatures the right of ceding any portion of their territory. But they did not, under the general power of making rules and regulations in relation to their domain. The opposers of this measure are then reduced to this dilemma—that the States had no right to disfranchise its citizens and cede the territory, and in so doing violate the rights unalienable, and that the General Government in its zeal to acquire the property, had been guilty of an act of unwarrantable usurpation and tyranny; or they must yield to the correctness of my exposition; the difficulty then vanishes, and both the States and the Federal Government have acted correctly.

The territory belonged to them, and they had the right to pass their cession laws. If it belonged to them of right, it now belongs to us, and is now our domain. It cannot, however, be our domain, if there is a restriction upon our power; and the denial of the right of disposal is such a restriction. But, why labor this question? The gentleman who had just sat down, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) in the soundness of whose understanding and the perspicuity of whose mind I have the highest confidence, has made a fair surrender: he candidly admits that, at some period or other, this measure may not only be expedient, but become absolutely necessary. Is not this an explicit avowal of the power? The gentleman has too much candor to deny it.

As to the expediency of retrocession, he would add a few words. When he took a view of this mighty ten miles square, he saw nothing pleasant—nothing political—to commend. He spoke of the inhabitants, whenever he had occasion to allude to them, with pity and compassion; and he most devoutly wished to see them placed, as Americans, in a condition more congenial to his own feelings, and the feelings of every true lover of civil and political freedom. The question in this point of view will be, Is it proper for Congress at this time to recede the parts of the District contemplated by the resolutions?

He should allude to the expense, in order to give an answer to that question—an expense enormous, indeed, yet every day increasing, and one which threatened to defeat every calculation made to ascertain its amount. The time of Congress is occupied day after day in trifling Legislative provisions for this or that particular spot, so inconsiderable in size or commercial importance as scarcely to furnish a speck in the map of the United States. But laying this circumstance out of sight, he would ask, Was Congress competent to legislate for the inhabitants of the District? He had hoped when he first came to Washington that they were, but experience had convinced him that they were not equal to the task. One day they received petitions to make certain provisions for the benefit of the people of the District, and Congress, with the best intentions and dispositions, went into the inquiry. After some progress made therein, a counter-petition is presented, and the House is suspended between two or more jarring interests. How much better, then, would it be to let these people have recourse to those Governments which understand their real views, and can adopt measures to ameliorate their condition! Congress is composed of materials too heterogeneous ever to do this with any tolerable satisfaction.

We are told, that, without the consent of the inhabitants of the District, they cannot be receded; and it is alleged that they are opposed to retrocession, and are willing to remain under the jurisdiction of Congress. If they are content in this situation, be that to themselves; but he was extremely loth to admit that any set of men could voluntarily remain in their degraded situation. It was stated that they might be induced to prefer this alternative to retrocession, because they had vested their all in property in the District. He did not discover how the value of property would be affected by a retrocession. He admitted that it would by a removal, but he had no idea of removal. If that question was before the House, he would be the last man to give it his assent; and he was willing now to go as far as any member to satisfy the inhabitants that a removal shall not be the consequence of retrocession.

We are told the people are happy at present, and why disturb their tranquillity?—that they are better represented than any other part of the Union, for they may choose the member to whom they may think proper to confide their affairs. Let us examine this circumstance. They have no rights; and is there anything so bewitchingly grateful in the sound of ten miles square or Columbian District to compensate for their humiliation of condition? It is true, they may find some alleviation in the boasted privilege of choosing from one hundred and seventy masters, but they ought to recollect that many masters are worse than one. In this state of listlessness and affected tranquillity I discover strong and weighty reasons for the measure now before us—the destruction of the source of so contagious an example. When people around the seat of Government shall be so unaccountably indifferent to their best rights, it may pervade the surrounding country, and give a fashion and currency to this anti-revolutionary doctrine; and though, from the present inhabitants we may have nothing to hope, let us not relinquish in despair the rising generation.

But we must obtain, say gentlemen, the consent of the people of the District, before they can be receded. Were they asked at the cession? And what consent have they to give? They have no rights, and, from the description we have had of them, they are very unfit instructors to the Representatives of a free and independent people. They may be the proper instruments, indeed, to enslave the balance of the nation; and they have already, at their deliberations, taken measures to ascertain more accurately their numbers, and adopt more efficacious means for carrying their purposes into effect. If this language can be used when their numbers are so inconsiderable, what will they not do when their numbers shall increase! Gentlemen say we have no right to impair contracts. What contracts, I ask, do these resolutions tend to impair? They violate no man's engagement; they take away no man's property; they devastate no man's house; they plunder no man's family.

On the contrary, they intend the amelioration of those who have here sold their birthrights for a mess of pottage, by sending them back to their natural parent, who with open arms will receive and nurture them with the fondness of an indulgent and tender mother, and not suffer them any longer to be supplied by the grudging hand of a cruel and hard-hearted step-dame. We are told this measure will lessen the value of property. I very much doubt this fact. Who, I ask, will go into this speculative calculation upon the rise or fall of property? Some may give more to live in the District, under the Government of the United States—others to live under the State Governments, in the enjoyment of their political rights. The people had, however, hailed the approach of Congress with the songs of joy and gladness, and it will be cruel to array them with the mantle of mourning. Did this joy, I ask, arise, from patriotism or (motives less praiseworthy) the increased value of property? I suspect the latter; and this source of their gladness is not to be destroyed. Congress will still remain here, and he had already declared that he would be the last man in the world to advocate its removal.

Mr. SLOAN.—My friend from Maryland (Mr. NELSON) has observed that it is customary for members to express their sentiments on subjects under discussion in the House—not that he expected to make one proselyte by his observations. I perfectly agree with him, that there is no reason to believe that he has, for this plain reason: he has not adduced a single fact in support of his argument; but, after exploding all conclusions drawn from implication or construction, drew his own from nothing else.

But, Mr. Chairman, under sanction of the aforesaid custom, and also from a sense of duty, I beg the attention of this Committee to some brief observations on this important subject. I consider it as altogether improper, unfair, and unjust to blend a subject under discussion with others not even contemplated, and to endeavor to influence the minds of members with predictions of certain events, yet in the womb of futurity, that may or may not come to pass. The end contemplated by the present resolutions is neither the removal of the seat of Government nor to prevent Congress from exercising exclusive jurisdiction over any territory, but to reduce the present quantum. But, say the opposers of these resolutions, the proposed retrocession of a part of the territory is intended as an opening wedge, preparatory to a total retrocession and removal of the seat of Government.

Mr. Chairman, I do not pretend to a foreknowledge of any member's thoughts before they are articulated in words; those who have this foreknowledge have a great advantage over other members who have it not; but I am free to declare that my opinion is quite the reverse—believing that the retrocession of that part of the territory contemplated by the resolutions now under consideration would have a tendency to continue the seat of Government in this place.

But it has been asserted that we have no right to make the proposed retrocession, and from the dictatorial style of the resolutions of the town of Alexandria, and the positive assertions that we have heard on this floor that it was unconstitutional, oppressive, and tyrannical, I expected, from the usual accuracy and correctness of the member who made those assertions, (Mr. DENNIS,) that he was in possession of documents to substantiate the fact; but to my surprise, instead of such documents, he has adduced and principally relied on the Constitution, in which there is not a single imperative sentence obligatory on Congress, either to receive a cession, or, when received, to continue exclusive jurisdiction over one foot of territory—the plain and unequivocal language of the Constitution leaving it perfectly optional whether to receive, and, if received, whether to retain jurisdiction or not. Hence, I conceive that no Legislative body can be justly charged with tyranny or oppression for altering or (if from experience it becomes necessary) disannulling their own acts—a contra-opinion I consider as altogether uncongenial to improvement, genuine liberty, and the inherent rights of man, and as such, I hope will ever be exploded in these United States.

Mr. Chairman, the constitutionality and right to recede being settled, it turns solely on the principle of expediency. Here let me ask, what advantage the United States derives from exercising exclusive jurisdiction over that part of the territory proposed to be receded? Is not the city sufficient, even admitting the utility or necessity of exclusive jurisdiction? I conceive that no possible advantage can be drawn from a larger quantum of territory. Here let me call the attention of the House to the real and obvious disadvantages: These are, at least, the loss of the time of one hundred and seventy-five members of Congress from twenty to thirty days annually spent in legislating for the District, at an expense of from thirty to forty thousand dollars. This enormous expense can only be justified upon the principle contended for during the late Administration, that "A public debt was a public blessing;" and consequently that the greater the debt the greater the blessing.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not consider the expense as the greatest evil; I consider it as incompatible with the principle of taxation and representation being inseparable, and counteracting the just principle of equal rights set forth in our Declaration of Independence, to obtain which the noble patriots of America fought, bled, and died! And shall we, whilst thousands are yet living, who, at the risk of their lives, obtained for us the inestimable blessings of liberty, evince to the world that we despise and reject this heavenly gift, this celestial treasure, by continuing in the centre of the Union, at the seat of Government, thousands of our fellow-citizens, deprived of the elective franchise, exactly in that degraded situation which the noble patriots before-mentioned chose rather to suffer death than continue in? I hope we shall not.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, considering the principle of exclusive jurisdiction over so large a territory dangerous in its tendency, and as contrary in its nature, to the liberty and independence of these United States, as the frigid to the temperate zone; considering it as nursing a germ of aristocracy in our bosom—as an inexplicable paradox, of liberty supporting tyranny, and as a vulture rising in the centre of the Union, to prey upon the vitals of liberty—I conceive it a duty I owe, not only to my constituents and the present generation, but also for the sake of millions yet unborn, to call upon the members of this House, if not in our power at present to destroy this yet unfledged monster in its infancy, at least to clip its wings so close, that if permitted to live to mature age, it will be unable to fly upon its prey.

Mr. JACKSON.—Mr. Chairman: When this subject was first presented to Congress during the present session, I felt a strong predilection in favor of the resolutions, and contemplated to give them my warmest support; after the maturest deliberation I have changed the opinion I had partially formed, and with the permission of the Committee I will proceed to explain the reasons which to my mind have been conclusive in influencing that opinion.

The question depends upon two propositions. 1st, The right to cede; 2ndly, The policy of the cession. Upon the first point, I am free to declare, the clause in the Constitution which has been relied on by the gentlemen who have preceded me, does not prohibit us from adopting the resolutions. The words, "Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation" are not imperative; a grant of power does not imply a coercion to assume its exercise; if it did we should be in a monstrous dilemma. Congress, the Constitution says, shall have power to declare war, to lay and collect taxes, to borrow money, to raise and support armies, &c.; yet no man will contend that we are bound to adopt these measures indiscriminately. We search the Constitution in vain for the authority to repeal a law; it is an inherent right, incident to all Governments; the right to repeal, unless expressly prohibited, or unless violating or impairing contracts growing out of laws, is co-extensive with the power of enacting them, and this power to exercise exclusive legislation, is conceived in the same terms with the other powers given by the eighth section to Congress.

Mr. Chairman: While I admit there is nothing in the Constitution directly prohibitory of the retrocession, I believe the spirit of that instrument would thereby be violated. It is predicated upon the sovereignty and indivisibility of the States, and the impossibility of dividing them, of transferring, or extending their territories, or of ever exercising any act of sovereignty over the people without their consent. By the adoption of the Constitution the people of the United States consented that a partial transfer should be made to Congress of a territory not exceeding ten miles square, with its citizens, for certain specified purposes; but by doing so they did not authorize Congress to dispose of them as they might think fit. An inference has been made by the friends of the resolutions, that the right of transfer is an implied right, because it is not prohibited. Is this a true construction of our charter? If this is, then indeed the great care expended in defining the powers of this Government had been worse than useless; because it held forth an idea to the States who were invited to adopt it, that it was limited in its objects. If the right to cede the jurisdiction over the District of Columbia is inferred, because no Constitutional barrier exists, the right to cede a portion of any State in the Union may be exercised likewise. If the Constitution did not repel this idea, there is a natural and inherent right incident to all governments which rejects it. The right of the people to be consulted as to the propriety of transferring the sovereign power over them is a special and a natural right; and social and natural rights survive the dissolution and wreck of States. By adopting a system of civil policy we give up certain natural rights; but an act of the Government transferring the sovereignty over us to others, without our consent, would be totally subversive of the fundamental principles of the social compact, tyrannical, null, and void. We have been told by gentlemen, that precedents may be found in our statutes, for the transfer of territory without the consent of the people; and have we indeed arrived at that epoch, when precedents once established are so much power? Precedents somewhat analogous, made without opposition when the principles involved in them were not examined! I hope in God we have not; when we do, then adieu to liberty! But, the precedents quoted are not in point; the transfer of Upper Louisiana to the government of the Indiana Territory is not a similar case. That country was acquired by treaty; the principles of the Constitution do not apply to it; it was not a part of the United States, and did not comprehend any portion of the people who were parties to the compact: and I do not believe that it can even be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States without an express amendment to the Constitution for that purpose. It would contravene the object of the Constitution, for Congress to assume the right of admitting Louisiana into the Union, unless authorized by an amendment for that purpose; as much as to admit the Island of Ceylon or any other island or continent, whose population would be sufficiently numerous to destroy the very principles of the Government; therefore the disposition of Upper Louisiana by the act of last session does not afford an analogous case.

Thus much for the constitutionality of the question. I will now examine whether it is politic to make the recession. In approaching this part of the inquiry, gentlemen lament in the most pathetic terms the degradation of human nature, and the prostration of the principles inculcated by "the rights of man," in the unwillingness of the people of this District to accept the proffered blessings of a free government. Sir, I am disposed to think charitably of these people, and if possible to find an apology for their conduct, in preference to pronouncing the terrible denunciation that they are fit engines of political despotism; and I do not believe that their opposition to a recession is conclusive evidence of political depravity. The people of Alexandria know that their influence in the State of Virginia would be as a drop in the ocean. The privileges extended to them would be merely nominal; they would be an integral part of the county of Fairfax, which is authorized to send two representatives to the State Legislature, and whose representation could not be controlled by them. Representation governed by population are the fundamental principles of freedom. In contemplating these, they would recollect the county of Warwick with a white population of (I think) 635 white inhabitants, which has an equal representation in the popular branch of the Legislature with Frederick, containing 24 or 25,000. Warwick, charged with a land tax of $349 13, which has an equal representation with Harrison, whose land tax is $5,515 85, per annum! What would be said to a proposition giving the State of Delaware an equal representation on this floor with New York, Pennsylvania, or any other of the great States in the Union? Yet a much greater inequality exists in the representation in Virginia. By the Virginia laws the poor man is compelled to labor as many days in repairing and improving the highway as his rich neighbor, not owning slaves, possessed of a princely fortune; and he is also compelled to pay an equal sum annually to defray the county charges, and for the maintenance of the poor. These monsters, in what we call a Republican system, exist in the constitution and government of Virginia; and with these facts, which have been more sensibly felt by the people included in the territory west of the Potomac than the darkness which pervaded the land of Egypt in the days of Moses, we are told that their refusal to join their destinies with Virginia is conclusive evidence of a penchant for political despotism. But, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding what I have stated, I should be disposed to join those who have depicted their miserable and abject condition in such glowing colors, if the question propounded to them were: Will you consent to remain forever without a representation, and the inestimable right of suffrage, in preference to annexation to Virginia? Sir, this is not the prospect before them. They expect a local Legislature—a free representation—a government given by the generous feelings and liberality of the States and of Congress; and if it be necessary, I have no doubt they will, by an amendment to the Constitution, permit them to realize these expectations. This disposition may induce them to remain even longer in their present state, encountering all its temporary evils. Gentlemen say it is politic to recede, to avoid the great trouble and expense of legislating for the District. I acknowledge they are great, but they can be better avoided by giving a local Legislature than by the adoption of the resolutions. They contemplate retaining the jurisdiction over the City of Washington. For what purpose? Certainly for the purpose of relieving their wants by legislating for them. And where, I will ask you, sir, is the mighty difference between the trouble of legislating for a district of ten miles square, and a district of four miles square, the size of the City of Washington? Their general laws must be the same, and the only difference consists in the passage of a few more laws for local purposes. An additional, and to my mind, important consideration is, that by the measure we shall have to continue these people included in the city, much longer in the state they now are, as they alone are incapable of supporting the expenses of a subordinate government. Mr. Chairman, stability, of all things, is most desirable. The enemies of the republican system have predicted that the want of it will produce convulsions in the body politic—the certain precursors of its dissolution. By giving into instability, national faith and national convenience become convertible terms; all confidence in the Government will be lost—its credit at home and respect abroad will be destroyed, and it will be the reproach of all nations. By instability we shall become the prey of despotism, and then republican America will give the awful example to the world, that in the very age she achieved her liberty she also bore testimony of its incompatibility with the degenerate state of man. It is always impolitic to do injustice. The value of property will be diminished by the recession. Admit this year that the argument of the propriety of receding on account of the great trouble of legislation be a good one. Next year an argument more substantially correct, and verified by the feelings of every member, may likewise be urged, and Congress called upon to remove to Baltimore, Philadelphia, or New York. The establishment of the Government here is a part of the same system with the location of the ten miles square; they depend on the same principles—the Constitution is not more explicit in the one case than the other. Admit the right to recede, the right to remove is also admitted. The propriety of the measure has indeed already been contended for. The people associate the two ideas, and if they believe that Congress ever will remove, whether they do or not, its effect will be the same. Congress, in the act of acceptance of jurisdiction, declared that this ten miles square should be the permanent seat of Government. The people considered the faith of the nation pledged that the Government should conduct its operations here; and under it, in many instances, they vested all their fortunes in city property. Now to remove, or by any other act to injure the value of property, would be an act of injustice. There is no difference in principle between an injury done to one, and that inflicted on a whole nation. The smallest animalculæ feel as much pain in expiring as the Brobdingnagian giants. I will never give my consent wantonly to sport with the rights and feelings of this people, and therefore shall vote against these resolutions.

The Committee now rose and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 9.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making an appropriation for completing the south wing of the Capitol at the City of Washington, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchants' service,' with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on a motion "to recede to the State of Virginia and Maryland the jurisdiction of such parts of the Territory of Columbia as are without the limits of the City of Washington."

Mr. LUCAS.—After having heard the question under consideration so extensively and ably discussed, I rise with the greatest diffidence; indeed, I do rise, not so much in hope to throw light as to justify the vote which I intend to give.

That I may preserve perspicuity, I shall investigate the following points in their proper order. Has Congress the Constitutional power to cede to the States of Maryland and Virginia part of the District of Columbia? Has Congress the power to cede it without the consent of the inhabitants of the parts intended to be ceded? Is it expedient to make that cession, both with respect to the United States and with respect to the inhabitants of the parts intended to be ceded?

The power vested in Congress by the Constitution to accept a district not exceeding ten miles square, to become the seat of Government, is a power which appears to stand on a perfect level with all the other powers enumerated in the eighth section of the first article; it is as optional to Congress to accept or not accept a district not exceeding ten miles, as to lay or not lay duties, imposts, or excises. There was a seat of Government before the District of Columbia was in existence, and there may be a seat of Government after the District of Columbia may have ceased to exist. If it be urged that, inasmuch as there is not in the Constitution an express delegation of powers to cede the district, Congress cannot cede it. I shall be told that, as there is no express power delegated by the Constitution, to repeal laws laying impost or excise, Congress cannot repeal such laws. This argument proves too much, to prove anything. My apprehension of the power of Congress is, that whatever it has the power to do, it hath the virtual power to undo; indeed, without that power Congress could not change its operations with circumstances, nor improve the system of legislation.

The next question is this: Has Congress the power to cede a part of the District of Columbia without the consent of the inhabitants of that part? This point leads to a previous one. Could the Legislatures of Virginia and Maryland originally cede to Congress a part of their States not exceeding ten miles square, without the consent of the inhabitants of the parts ceded? I believe that those Legislatures had not that power. It ought to be remembered that the inhabitants of the District of Columbia, although they have been represented, in the course of the debates, as men in a state of degradation, were a part of the people who, in the preamble of the Constitution of the United States, did express themselves in the following manner: "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity," &c. The right of being represented in the Legislatures of their respective States and in Congress, was the right of the inhabitants of the District of Columbia, at the time they were component parts of the States of Virginia and Maryland. Those blessings of liberty were secured to them and their posterity by their respective State constitutions, and by the Federal compact. How, then, can it be conceived that the Legislatures of Virginia and Maryland had the power to give them away, to become subject to the "Executive legislation of Congress in all cases whatsoever;" that is, to be deprived of their elective franchise and right of representation? How can it be conceived that the Legislatures of these States, that are the creatures of the Constitution, had the power to bereave Americans of the most valuable rights that the Constitution of their country guaranty to them? It is the comfort and pride of an American, that no power on earth but his own can deprive him of his Constitutional rights; this is a principle self-evident. But it is urged, that the inhabitants of the District of Columbia, notwithstanding this, are actually subject to Congress, without elective franchise. This I grant. But if they are so, it is by their consent, without which the cession could not have been legitimate. Thus it has been their pleasure to barter their elective franchise for pecuniary advantages, or other considerations arising from being within the bounds of the seat of Government. It is evidently a matter of choice on their part, and they have been put in that situation neither by violence nor conquest. To those who contend that the Legislature of Maryland and Virginia were of themselves as competent to make the cession to Congress as Congress was competent to accept, I beg leave to observe that, yet, as by those acts, the right of elective franchise of the inhabitants of the parts ceded would have been virtually defeated; this brings me back to my former position, that the cession made by Maryland and Virginia could not be legitimate without the consent of the inhabitants of the parts ceded, otherwise the Constitution would give power to invade liberties which, at the same time, the Constitution intended to secure. This consent was given by acclamation; even the women and children of the district rejoiced on that occasion. Hence, the consent of the inhabitants of the district having been necessary to render the cession legitimate, and that consent having been given, a contract exists between them and Congress; a contract may exist, and does generally exist, between the governors and the governed; the protection and subjection are reciprocal obligations even in monarchies. The whigs of England contended, in 1688, that James Second, had violated the original contract between him and his people, a contract which nobody pretended to be reduced to forms and written, but which, nevertheless, was binding, and derived its force from the relations necessarily existing between the monarch and the subject.

H. OF R.

Certainly, Mr. Chairman, the inhabitants of this district are not in a worse situation than subjects are under a monarchy; yet a worse treatment is offered to them; by the present resolutions they are to be receded against their consent to Maryland and Virginia. The word recession heretofore unknown in a contract, is introduced in the resolutions, I suppose, to soften or put the affront offered to the people of this district under disguise; by this intended recession, they are to be transferred as a bale of goods; and if they can be transferred to Maryland and Virginia, they may be transferred to Vermont and Georgia; for the acts by which they have been severed from Maryland and Virginia are perfect and complete; and what is termed a recession in those resolutions is as completely a transfer as if the district had never been a part of Maryland and Virginia. But a gentleman from Virginia has told us that, by the cession and acceptance, Congress is omnipotent over the district; for my part I am at a loss to find the reasons that can justify such an assertion; the Constitution gives Congress the power "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district." How can it be said that exclusive legislation and omnipotence are convertible terms?

Under the monarchy of France, before the revolution, the King did exercise exclusive legislation; yet he could not make a transfer of the monarchy. By fundamental laws, it was descendible in a lineal succession, and not otherwise. Had the dynasty been extinguished, the three estates of France would have been the sole authority competent to make the choice of a new dynasty. Thus, the people of France, although under the exclusive legislation of their King, were vested by the fundamental laws of the monarchy with an eventual political right. The exercise of a power, and the power itself, are then obviously two distinct things.

Believing that I have proved that the consent of the inhabitants of the district was necessary to legitimate the cession made by the States of Virginia and Maryland; it being also notorious that such a consent has been given, and that an implied contract exists between the inhabitants of the district and the people of the United States, they have a right to the protection of Congress, as Congress has a right to their obedience. These mutual obligations cannot, in my opinion, be defeated, but by mutual consent, or at least, if Congress should find it inconvenient to exercise the power of legislation over the district, the terms of submission, on the part of the inhabitants of the district, and also reason and justice, require that they should be restored to themselves, and not be an object of transfer. The right of a guardian over an orphan is a species of jurisdiction and government; yet a guardian cannot transfer his right to another. If he finds it inconvenient to discharge his duties he may resign. It is the right of an orphan, if he has attained the age of discretion, to choose his own guardian. The feudalists themselves acknowledge that the rights of patronage, of church jurisdiction, and other feudal honors, are not transferable, unless as a dependence of a glebe or manor. The transfer of jurisdiction intended by the resolutions before the Committee is less justifiable than if it had originated in feudal principles; it is neither a dependence nor appurtenance of any glebe or other object susceptible of transfer.

H. OF R.

District of Columbia.

JANUARY, 1805.

Among others, two gentlemen from Virginia have told us that the inhabitants of the District of Columbia are in a state of political amihilation; that they possess no right; that they are unconstitutionally at the discretion of Congress. I am one of those that cannot give my assent to these positions. I believe that they possess political and civil rights, which Congress has no power to abridge or impair. I believe that Congress and they are mutually bound by moral obligations. The exercise of exclusive legislation over the district by Congress, not having been introduced by violence or conquest, cannot be, consequently, of a despotic kind. It necessarily partakes of the qualities of the power of legislation commonly exercised by a political and civil authority. The power which the Constitution authorizes Congress to exercise is defined; it is to exercise exclusive legislation. This exercise is no more, as I have already said, than the use of a power, and by no means the ownership of that power. If the right of ownership is not vested in Congress, it remains in the inhabitants of the district; thus far the people of the district possess a political right; this consequence arises fairly from the premises, and is perfectly congenial with the elements of American polity.

The inhabitants of the district possess also civil rights; for the exercise of the power of legislation vested in Congress is generally qualified by the declaration of rights, introduced in the amendment to the Constitution: "Congress shall pass no law respecting an establishment of religion," &c. This restriction applies to all laws whatever: a law passed by Congress for the government of this district is not less a law of Congress than a law passed by Congress for the government of the United States—hence, the people possess civil rights. As to moral rights, no society can exist without them, unless in a momentary struggle of revolution. These rights are reciprocal and obligatory upon moral agents, either in a single or corporate capacity.

Mr. Chairman, I must confess, however, that the situation of the inhabitants of this district is not such as I should like to be in. No pecuniary advantages could ever induce me to part with my elective franchise; but it has been the pleasure of those people to part with theirs, and the Constitution of the United States has authorized them to do so. Taste has no criterions: "San quemque trahit voluptas." The people of this district are in such a situation as had been foreseen and intended by the good and great men who framed the Constitution of the United States. To find fault with the situation of the people of this district, in point of principle, is to find fault with the Constitution. Were I so tender for their rights as some gentlemen appear to be; were I conscious that the manner in which they are governed is of a pernicious example to the people of the United States, I should endeavor to apply a radical remedy. I should move an amendment to the resolutions, by including also the city; for, in principle, the evil remains the same, if the district be continued within the bounds of the city.

I cannot, for my part, carry my philanthropy so far as to enforce upon persons privileges which they do not wish to have. A man who lives in Turkey would not thank us for dragging him into our free country. I do not think I should have relished the liberties of America, if I had been taken from France by force, and brought here against my own will. Our choice is a necessary ingredient in our enjoyment; but if the two gentlemen from Virginia feel such tenderness for the rights of others, and are so fond of extending the elective franchise, let their charity begin at home; there they will find a full opportunity to extend and improve the system of representation.

Mr. Chairman, were I an inhabitant of the District of Columbia, having but a small property, I think that I should be very little anxious to better my condition by going to live in Virginia. I know that my political influence would be there merely nominal; I know that whatever my moral worth might be, I could not stand in competition with those who possess that kind of property which is entitled to representation. I know that my occupation and habits would keep me a stranger among my neighbors, and render my situation uncomfortable, perhaps disgusting.

Had Congress the power to refuse to legislate over the District of Columbia; nay, had it the power to cede that district to Maryland and Virginia, would it be expedient to do it? For my part, I avow that I do not see a great utility in the Constitutional provision, which authorizes Congress to accept a district. I am one of those who believe that the safety and independence of Congress must rest upon their regard to the true interests of the people of the United States, and the virtue and spirit of that people. I believe that when these things shall be wanting, it is idle to think that the District of Columbia can make up the deficiency. However, the sages who framed the Constitution thought that a district might be useful. The Congress that did accept the district, and the several Congresses that did let it exist, are authorities of great weight and respectability. I feel averse to undo what a future Congress cannot do again. If we cede to Maryland and Virginia any part of the District of Columbia, is it to be expected, in case another Congress should wish to have those parts restored, that Maryland and Virginia, after having experienced the versatility of the present Congress, would consent to make another session? It plainly appears to me that, if the resolutions now before the Committee be adopted, any future Congress will become virtually disabled from restoring the district to its present extent. This unavoidable consequence adds, in my mind, importance to the question. Those that will sit within these walls next year will have a more recent evidence of the people's confidence than that which we now possess.—Would it not be more prudent to leave them the opportunity of exercising their opinions upon these resolutions?

As to the expediency of the contemplated session, so far as it relates to the inhabitants of the district, I shall not undertake to say anything. They know much better than I do what suits them; and if it was their interest to be ceded again, we would have seen them offering here their consent, or petitioning for the session.

Mr. THATCHER was opposed to the motion for a recession, and he had heard only two reasons urged in favor of the measure; that the exercise of exclusive legislation by Congress over the District of Columbia was attended with an undue expense of the public money, and occupied so much of their time, that the business of the Union was interrupted and put to a stand by the interference of the local concerns of this place. This statement he did not believe to be perfectly correct; no doubt some of their time was taken up, but he would leave it to every gentleman to say, whether, if they had even more business before them than they had, there was not time enough to transact it. The House usually sat from eleven o'clock until three; but it must have been frequently observed, that the adjournment took place much earlier for want of business to employ them. But he was not an advocate for the present mode of conducting the business of the district; it would perhaps be a better way to give them a subordinate government, controllable by Congress; or a committee of Congress might be appointed for the purpose. He did not see that the complaint of too much legislation was well founded, in anything that had taken place during the present session. If the little labor they had to perform was too great for them, what must the labor of their predecessors have been, who had passed all the laws in existence for the government of the district, and yet he had never heard any complaint made by them on the ground now taken; they knew that the Constitution enjoined upon them the duty of exercising exclusive legislation over the ten miles square, and they performed it with patient attention.

His mind revolted at the idea of recession. Gentlemen had contended that the powers exercised over the people of Columbia, were derogatory of, and inconsistent with, the principles of free government. Yet, what does this motion for recession propose? Why, to transfer them and the territory away, in the manner practised in Russia, in the transfer of provinces or manors transferring the vassals with the soil. This may be truly called derogatory to the principles of freedom. Nor is this all; for you do not transfer them merely without their consent, but in the face of their serious remonstrances against the transfer.

When he considered the doubts which had been suggested, as to its being Constitutional or not, he declared that such a circumstance would decide him to vote against the measure, and he supposed it would decide the vote of every member who was not fully and clearly satisfied that Congress possessed, under the grants of the Constitution, the power of recession. But, if we have a Constitutional right to recede the jurisdiction, we may transfer it to whom we please; but such a measure being merely an act of Congress, could not bind up the hands of a future Congress to assume the power over it at some future day; and if the parts of the District were severally given to the States of Maryland and Virginia, what is to prevent them from giving the whole back whenever Congress might require it? From this view of the case, he did not see that the members in favor of recession were likely to fix it on any durable foundation.

A gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. FINDLEY) had contended that, unless Congress was restricted by the Constitution from receding this territory, Congress possessed the right, as essential to their exclusive legislation. He, for his part, considered the converse of this proposition to be the truth; and gentlemen were bound to show that part of the Constitution which gave the power now contended for. If they cannot show this, their right may be doubted, and under such circumstances the safer mode of proceeding would be to reject the resolutions.

He was further of opinion that the inexpediency of the measure was of itself sufficient to induce the Committee to lay it aside. It had been stated, and he knew the facts to be true, that at one time the old Congress had been pent up in the house in which they were sitting by a party of soldiers, and at another time insulted by an assemblage of the people. Such circumstances as induced those outrages upon the National Government may occur again; but if Congress retain the power of exclusive jurisdiction they may, by a prudent caution, prevent these effects. The circumstances which he had mentioned, laid the foundation for granting, in the Constitution, the power alluded to; and while the nature of man continued the same as heretofore, he believed it would continue to be a regulation wise and expedient. He could enumerate several cases, such, for instance, as a contested Presidential election, in which the danger of sitting in a large city made independent of the control of Congress would be imminent; but he would forbear, as it would be as well understood as if expressed. He concluded with expressing his disapprobation of the present resolutions.

under consideration, it is not my intention to detain the Committee long; but as it is one of very considerable magnitude, and one upon which there seems to be a disposition among members to express their sentiments, and not content themselves with barely giving a silent vote, I crave the indulgence of a few minutes, while I state some difficulties which are still in the way of my voting in favor of the resolutions for a recession, unremoved by the discussions which have taken place. Gentlemen who advocate the resolutions now before the Committee, disavow an intention to do anything which may pave the way for the removal of the seat of Government from this place, or weaken the confidence of either the citizens of the District, or of the United States at large, in their belief that it will continue to be permanent. I am disposed to give full faith and credit to the sincerity of gentlemen making this declaration; but permit me to observe that the belief that the permanent continuance of our National Government at the City of Washington will not be affected by the recession, can be founded on nothing but conjecture. That it would materially affect the probability of such a permanency, and even prove an important inchoate step towards a removal, is also a matter of conjecture, which appears to me to be founded on quite as great a degree of probable evidence as the other, and so long as I retain this apprehension I cannot vote for the resolutions. So long as human nature continues what it is, and has always been, we may naturally expect that three rival places in the situation of Alexandria, Washington, and Georgetown, when owing allegiance to, and protected by, the immediate jurisdiction of three distinct, independent sovereignties, would be much more likely to enter into and prosecute measures mutually to cramp and injure the prosperity of each other, than when under the immediate control of the same sovereign authority, disposed to do justice, and render protection equally and impartially to them all.

Should such a disposition prevail, while they are under distinct sovereignties, the probable consequence would be, either that one would obtain such an ascendancy as to cause the others to sink, or that they would mutually weaken and injure each other. Should Alexandria, for instance, gain such an ascendancy as to cause this city to dwindle and come to nothing, a removal of the seat of Government, though not contemplated at present, might soon become a matter of necessity, and not of choice. Should such a necessity arise, and notwithstanding all the plausible arguments I have heard urged to the contrary, should the proposed recession take place, I cannot view it as an unimportant step towards that event; so many and different, and even clashing, are the local interests, and such the variety of manners and habits in the United States, which are constantly increasing with our extended and still extending population, that the fixing of another seat of Government might, and probably would, materially affect the Union itself. As I hope not only to see the union of the States to continue during my time, but that it may descend unbroken to ages yet unborn, I cannot vote for a measure which has, in my view, a remote, or even a conjectural, tendency to affect it.

I find also a Constitutional difficulty in the way of the recession, which has not been, to my apprehension, satisfactorily removed, by all the variety and ingenuity of argument, and all the labored discussions I have heard on the subject. I shall not again repeat that clause of the Constitution which has been already so often recited and commented upon by gentlemen on both sides of the present question. I only observe that, although the members composing a particular Congress are constantly changing, and Congresses, as distinguished into first, second, third, &c., follow each other in succession, yet the Constitution contemplates the Congress of the United States as being permanent, or immortal, if the expression may be permitted. When the Constitution says that Congress shall have jurisdiction, or the exclusive right of legislation, over a district of territory not exceeding ten miles square, it is not the particular Congress for the time being, but Congress generally, the permanent Congress of the United States, which is meant. I see not, therefore, that the present Congress possess the right to recede the territory so as, in any manner of way, to affect the right of their successors, or to hinder a future Congress, the next if you please, from reassuming the jurisdiction the first day of their session. Without granting the correctness of the position, yet admitting, for the sake of the argument, the first proceedings of Congress, in accepting the cession of the territory from the Legislatures of Virginia and Maryland, and assuming the jurisdiction over the same, to stand on the footing of mere Legislative acts, repealable at any time, at the pleasure of the Legislature, and that they did not partake of the nature of a Constitutional provision, or an irrepealable contract, even this would not, in the present instance, remove the difficulty from my mind. The Constitution vests Congress with the power of establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States. I single out this instance in particular, because I have already heard frequent allusions made to it, in the course of the debate, and because certain recent transactions must render that subject familiar to the minds of almost every member of the Committee. Agreeably to this provision, some years ago, a bankrupt law was enacted. Congress, at their last session, saw fit to repeal that law, and I believe it was done with great propriety. But will any person assert that Congress possessed a Constitutional power to pass a law, affecting the proceedings and decisions which had already taken place, and been carried into effect under the law which they had seen fit to repeal, or to restrict a future Congress from either re-enacting, at pleasure, the same law, or framing another statute to the same effect? I believe this will not be asserted. But, by the resolutions on the table, it is contemplated to alienate from every succeeding Congress, that right of jurisdiction now vested in Congress by the Constitution of the United States; an act which cannot but materially affect the proceedings which have taken place during the continuance of the session. It appears to me, therefore, difficult for the warmest advocates for the resolutions to prove that Congress possess any Constitutional power to make such a permanent recession of this territory as can, in any way, affect or impair the right of the next, or of any future, Congress to reassume the jurisdiction, whenever it shall be thought proper. I believe there are several powers vested in Congress by the Constitution of the United States, which have never yet been carried into effect, and probably may not for many years to come, if ever. But will any member of this Committee assert that the present, or any particular, Congress has a right to pass a law declaring that these provisions of the Constitution shall not be carried into effect in future? I believe it will not be presumed that Congress possesses any such power.

JANUARY, 1805.

H. OF R.

Much has also been said about the expediency and necessity of the proposed recession, and a variety of arguments have been urged which, if they prove anything, it is only that the resolutions are inadequate to the contemplated object. This expediency or necessity, is grounded principally on two points, viz: In order to restore them to their natural and political rights, and to save Congress the trouble, and the nation the expense, of legislating for the territory. We have heard much ingenious declamation about the restoration of the citizens of Columbia to certain political rights of which they have been injuriously deprived by the act of cession, and such an affecting picture has been drawn of the present state of their degradation and vassalage, as would lead us to believe that their situation more nearly resembled that of the slaves of a Turkish Bashaw than that of citizens of the United States. Should a stranger be suddenly transported within these walls, and know nothing of the situation of the inhabitants of the surrounding district, only what he learnt from the picture drawn in certain discussions on this subject, what a scene of wretchedness would be pictured before his imagination! Would he not almost expect to have his ears assailed with the harsh grating sound of fetters and the clanking of chains, on going out into the streets; or, if there was so much liberty left as to permit their departure, to see the wretched inhabitants flying in every direction from this land of tyranny and oppression, this worse than Egyptian bondage, to the surrounding Edens of freedom and happiness? But, on making a tour through the District, how great would be his surprise to see the citizens of Columbia contented, free, and happy; to see the various classes of civilized society, the man of fortune, the merchant, the tradesman, the husbandman, and the laborer, each one quietly pursuing his respective occupation, and each enjoying the fruit of his labor, under the protection of mild and equitable laws. Attached as I am to the rights of man, and the principles of civil and political liberty, and wishing that those rights may be extended to every nation on the globe, capable of appreciating and enjoying them, I am not fully possessed of the propriety of doing an act, doubtful, at least, by the Constitution of the United States, for the purpose of restoring people to certain abstract rights, contrary to their wishes, and against their warmest remonstrances. Even the servant under the Jewish law, who had such an attachment to his master as to wish to remain in his present situation, was not compelled to go out free. Congress has been represented as standing in the relation of a master to this District. If this is correct, it is some consolation that, by evidence so irresistible, it appears to have hitherto proved a good master at least.

Being, I trust, as real a friend to the rights of man as any member on this floor, and wishing to extend, rather than abridge, those rights, I think it needless at present to enter into any dissertation on that subject. But if we confine political rights to the right of suffrage only, although I duly appreciate that right, and wish it extended as far as is consistent with the greatest political good of society, yet I hope I shall not be accused of nourishing a germ of aristocracy, or of harboring a vulture, either fledged or unfledged, in my bosom, when I express my belief that there are other rights of equal, if not of greater, importance; I mean that life, liberty, and property, be protected by mild and equitable laws, faithfully and impartially executed. No man who enjoys these privileges in their full extent, can be considered as enslaved or degraded. These rights are universal; they are the property of free citizens of all classes; but the right of suffrage can only be exercised by a part, and the extension of it in the several States is unequal. The modification of this right is different in the adjoining States of Virginia and Maryland. But I have no satisfactory evidence that the essential privileges of freemen are better secured to the citizens of Maryland than they are to those of Virginia. There is a small variation in the modification of this right, between the States of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, but I believe it will hardly be asserted that the citizens of New Hampshire are more free, and have their liberties more secure and better protected, than the citizens of Massachusetts. But in every State certain modifications of that right have been deemed necessary. In all the States, that sex which is formed by nature to be the ornament of society, and which, in every kingdom, state, or nation, forms half, or nearly so, of the whole population, is excluded. Of the male population, those under twenty-one years generally form more than one half; these are also excluded. If to these classes we add various other individuals of several descriptions, who are excluded, it will, I presume, appear that considerably less than one-fifth of the whole population enjoy the right of suffrage in those States wherein that right is farthest extended. But will it be said that the remaining four-fifths or upwards, are in a degraded situation, stripped of all privileges and destitute of the invaluable blessings of a free government, or that they have not equal security for life, liberty, and property? I trust it will not. I farther observe that, so far as the actual proceedings of Congress in certain cases express their sentiments correctly, it does not appear to be their opinion that the right of suffrage, and of framing and organizing a Government by their own immediate representatives, is, in every case, necessary for the security of life, liberty, and property. In the Territories of the United States, for example, i. e., those parts which are not so far advanced in population as to obtain a State constitution, their government is organized immediately under the direction of the President of the United States. Their rulers can feel but a small degree of individual responsibility to the people over whom they are placed, and the immediate responsibility of the President himself is still less, and, from local distance, or other causes, even his control over the agents of his own appointment, is somewhat remote. If a President of the United States is not, in these circumstances, deterred from acting tyrannically, by his regard to the maxims of sound policy, by his attachment to the Constitution of the United States, the spirit and genius of our Government, and by his sacred oath, and his responsibility to the nation at large, he will feel but very little check arising from his responsibility immediately to the citizens of the Territories. It will not, I believe, be admitted that they are in a state of political non-existence, that their rights are sported with, that either their lives, liberties, or property, are insecure, or themselves slaves. In passing the act last session of Congress for the government of the ceded territory of Louisiana, it did not seem to be the sense of the House that this particular description of political rights was, in all cases, necessary. But will it be admitted that the inhabitants are hereby deprived of everything essential to freedom, and that all that is worthy of preserving is rendered insecure? No, Mr. Chairman, this will not be admitted. Though sincerely wishing that, as soon as it can be done consistent with a Constitutional provision and the plighted faith of Government, the right of suffrage, as it respects the several branches of Government, may be as liberally extended to the citizens of Columbia as to other parts of the United States, yet, permit me to observe, that if any people can be secure under the temporary suspension of this description of political rights, we would naturally expect it to be the case of those who are immediately under the fostering care of the Legislature of the United States. I see not what motive those who are, by their station, guardians of the Constitution of the United States, and the liberties of the Union, can have to oppress the citizens of the District of Columbia. Congress, it is true, possess a physical power to violate the Constitution, and to enact an oppressive statute which may operate injuriously against this District. So they possess the same kind of power to pass a law which may be oppressive to either of the States of Georgia or Vermont. In this case, should the Representatives of Vermont, for instance, not be deterred from voting for a law to oppress the State of Georgia, by their fidelity to the Constitution of the United States, and by their solemn oaths and general responsibility to the nation at large, they would feel but little check arising from their immediate responsibility to the citizens of Georgia; and so, vice versa, of the Representatives of Georgia, in case the statute should have reference to Vermont. Certainly but few members of this House can feel a less degree of responsibility to the citizens of this District than would be felt in either of these cases. But is there any more danger that a statute, intentionally oppressive, would be sanctioned in the one case more than the other? Besides, although the District of Columbia has no immediate representative on this floor, yet it has now, and as long as it continues to be the seat of Government, will, from its contiguous situation, probably retain virtually as efficient a representation as any portion of territory of equal extent and population within the United States; nay, it probably has now, and will maintain, a greater influence over the deliberations of this House, especially when the peculiar local concerns of the territory are under consideration, than some whole States. An honorable gentleman who has given considerable scope to his imagination in painting the danger of oppression and tyranny to which the District is exposed by the continuance of the present system, admits that there is no immediate present danger, that he presumes the present Congress harbor no designs of that nature; but he entertains frightful apprehensions of danger arising from the uncontrolled, tyrannical dispositions of future Congresses. I grant it to be somewhat of a natural disposition in mankind to entertain the suspicion that every body of men to whom power is delegated, will be prone to abuse it, unless an exception is to be made in favor of our noble selves. There, at least, we can probably view it safe. But though it may be admitted that such an event is barely possible, yet I wish not to harbor the supposition for a single moment. I will not admit it to be probable that the citizens of the United States will be less careful in time to come, than they are now, or than they have been in times past, in selecting men of probity and virtue to represent them on this floor. Let us rather cherish the pleasing anticipation that our successors will make progress in wisdom, in patriotism, and in every public virtue. Probably no member of this House will say that such an event is undeniable, or that there is not room. Should an extension of the elective franchise, and a local legislation be deemed expedient, this may, I believe, be effected without any of those Constitutional difficulties involved in a recession.

But were we even to admit that this horrible system of degradation and oppression did actually exist, and that both in point of principle and expediency, a retrocession was necessary, the resolutions before the Committee are wholly inadequate to the contemplated object. If it is necessary to recede certain portions of the District, in order to restore the citizens to their political rights, the argument must be equally forcible for retrocession of the whole. If it is contrary to the spirit of our Government, and to every description of civil and political rights, that a District of ten miles square should be deprived of the elective franchise, it is certainly an equal infringement upon natural right that the City of Washington should be left in that situation. If it is wrong to exercise a tyrannical Government over the whole District, and if the present system is a tyrannical one, it is equally wrong to exercise it over the city. One, two, three, or four miles square ought no more to be tyrannized over than ten. So far, therefore, as these and similar arguments have any weight, they operate equally in favor of a retrocession of the whole as of a part. Should such a degree of confidence in the idea of this continuing to be the permanent seat of Government prevail, as to exclude all apprehensions of a future removal, it is highly probable that, before a very great lapse of years, the city would become, by far, the most populous of any part of the territory. Surely the political rights of the citizens ought to be as sacred as those of any part of the territory. With respect to the expediency of the retrocession, on account of the time necessarily spent in legislating for the territory, this, instead of being a growing evil, as seems to be apprehended by gentlemen, might, I think, probably be lessened. But whether this should be the case or not, the resolutions offer no adequate remedy for the evil; for if Congress has still to legislate for the city, there will be very little difference in respect to time between that and legislating for the whole territory, and it is even problematical whether there is really any expense of time; it is difficult to say, that the sessions of Congress would be shortened, or a cent saved to the public in that way, if the territory was receded. But should it be found necessary to spend a few days every session in legislating for this territory, it cannot be thought altogether unreasonable. For, with the exception of a very few of our largest commercial cities, I believe no portion of territory of the United States, of equal extent, contributes so largely to the revenue as the District of Columbia. Upon the whole, I hope the Committee will not agree to the resolutions.

H. OF R.

Mr. Root said that he should not have troubled the Committee during the discussion of this question, had it not been for the very extraordinary promise made yesterday by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NELSON.) That gentleman, in the exordium of a lengthy harangue, had promised that, before he sat down, he would convince every member of this Committee, that the passage of the resolutions on your table, was both unconstitutional and inexpedient. As he has not performed this promise in full, my mind remaining yet unconvinced, notwithstanding the supposed force of his arguments, I owe it to that gentleman to state some of the reasons which induce me to believe that the passage of the resolutions are both Constitutional and expedient.

The gentleman from Maryland has indulged himself in declaiming against forced constructions of the Constitution, the chicanery of lawyers, and the villany of judges, and descanting upon the unwritten Constitution of England. And how, Mr. Chairman, has he attempted to prove that the passage of these resolutions is unconstitutional? If I understood him correctly, he attempted it by resorting to that construction which he affects to condemn. Because the Constitution has delegated to Congress the power of exercising "exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever 'over such district, not exceeding ten miles square, 'as may, by cession of particular States and the 'acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the 'Government of the United States," and because Congress have accepted the cession of the District of Columbia, the gentleman seems to infer that Congress must, at all events, continue forever to exercise the exclusive jurisdiction over this District, and that no part of it can at any time, or under any circumstances, be transferred or receded. Whence, Mr. Chairman, is this inference drawn? Surely not from the Constitution itself, nor from the practice under that Constitution, unless by a very forced construction, indeed, and such an one as I would cordially join that gentleman in deprecating.

I should suppose, Mr. Chairman, if Congress, by the acceptance of the jurisdiction over this District, are inhibited by the Constitution from transferring the entire and exclusive legislation and sovereignty over that part thereof embraced by the resolutions now under discussion; that we cannot rightly delegate or transfer any part of the Legislative powers derived under the Constitution. The same principles which apply to the whole, are applicable to a part, and yet we see that certain Legislative powers have been delegated to the City of Washington. In one of the papers of this city we frequently see acts published with all the forms and solemnity of statute laws. Here we discover an exercise of Legislative powers upon subjects over which you have a concurrent jurisdiction. You have continued, and were but the other day engaged in passing a bill for extending certain Legislative powers to the Common Council of Alexandria, and yet I never heard the constitutionality of the measure called in question. But, sir, we have no occasion to have recourse to former practice, or opinions formerly entertained upon this subject. We need only to refer to the Constitution itself, and from that instrument, in my opinion, we can plainly and clearly discover the powers contended for by the mover of these resolutions. In the eighth section of the first article, it is ordained that "the 'Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive 'legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district, not exceeding ten miles square, as may by 'cession of particular States become the seat of 'the Government of the United States." Many powers are delegated to Congress by this article, and will gentlemen contend that, because the Constitution has declared that "the Congress shall have power" to do certain acts, that they must and shall at all events exercise those powers? Congress have power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies; they have exercised this power, but the bankrupt law is repealed. Congress have power to fix the standard of weights and measures; they have never thought proper to exercise this power, and will gentlemen say that our predecessors, as well as ourselves, have by this omission violated the Constitution of their country? The Congress have power to declare war, and must this power be also put in exercise, whether occasion shall require it or not? Or are gentlemen ready to say that when a war shall once be declared, that a peace cannot be concluded? Although there is no express power delegated in the Constitution for the conclusion of a peace, yet I am induced to believe that the President and Senate, by virtue of their treaty-making power, might put a stop to the ravages of war whenever such a calamity should happen to this nation.

We are told, Mr. Chairman, that Congress cannot constitutionally recede any part of this District without the consent of the people; that citizens cannot be passed away and alienated as an article of property; that they cannot be bartered like "cattle" or like the "vassals of Russia," and the gentleman from Maryland has referred us to certain modest resolutions of a meeting in Alexandria, which have been communicated for the information of Congress. Such expressions are well enough calculated to amuse the ear, but whether these citizens are to be considered as vassals appendant to the soil, or otherwise, I have no doubt but the Constitution authorizes in express terms the transfer contemplated by the resolutions on the table. I perfectly agree with gentlemen in the position, that Congress possess no powers except those delegated in the Constitution; but I contend that the power claimed by the advocates of these resolutions is clearly and expressly delegated. I can point out, in the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. THATCHER) the chapter and verse where such power may be found. By the eighth section of the first article, "the Congress shall have the power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such District, not exceeding the ten miles square," &c. Here we find the power of legislating without limitation or control on all subjects which may properly come before any Legislature. If the Legislature of a State can make a cession like the present, surely we possess the same power. The Legislatures of Virginia and Maryland, acting in their ordinary Legislative capacities, have ceded this District to the United States, and by the same principle we may recede. The Congress possess all power of legislation over this District, which is not forbidden by the Constitution. The power now claimed not being forbidden, nor denied to belong to the ordinary Legislature of a State, is already delegated to Congress, by the article, to which I have just referred. I know, sir, that gentlemen have said that the consent of the people to the original cession was virtually expressed through their Representatives in the Legislatures of Virginia and Maryland. But I would ask if there is any article or clause in the constitutions of those States which expressly authorize their Legislatures to make that cession?

And, if not, whether the people themselves, by any public act of theirs, specially authorized and instructed their Representatives to make the cession? I presume that neither can be shown; of course, it was but an ordinary act of legislation, growing out of a general delegation of powers. The same powers are possessed by Congress, and may be put in exercise even without the consent of these people; we can tax them without their consent; we can pass laws to bind them in all cases whatsoever, and I presume gentlemen will not think it necessary to ask their consent. By an ordinary act of legislation these people have been once assigned, like cattle, if gentlemen please, and I am ready to reaffirm them to the States where they originally belonged.

If, Mr. Chairman, the cessions of Virginia and Maryland were extraordinary acts of legislation not flowing from the ordinary Legislative powers, and as no special and express consent of the people has been pretended, I should suppose that those acts are void. These resolutions, then, amount to nothing more than a relinquishment of claim. If we have a bad rule, let us abandon it. But, I am inclined to believe that a State Legislature, acting in its ordinary Legislative capacity, may cede and transfer the jurisdiction over a part of her citizens and territory. Connecticut and New York have exercised this power; South Carolina and Georgia have done the same. The conclusion, in my mind, is, that Congress, in exercise of the ordinary Legislative powers over this District, as delegated in the Constitution, may rightfully adopt the resolutions on your table.

The gentleman from Maryland has endeavored to perform the second part of his extraordinary promise by calling those resolutions the "stepping stone" to a retrocession of the City of Washington; and another gentleman (Mr. THATCHER) considers them "but an entering wedge" to the retrocession of the city and the removal of the seat of Government. I confess, sir, that I do not feel much alarm at the observations. The retrocession of the city would not be to me a deplorable event. If any gentlemen will make a motion to that effect, I will cheerfully second him; and, indeed, I should not much deplore the event of a removal of the seat of Government. But I am willing to adopt the resolutions, as they are offered; we shall gain a great point by getting rid of those rival towns and their conflicting interests. If I cannot be gratified in full, I shall content myself by shaking off a part of this cumbrous load.

Mr. DAWSON.—The resolutions, which are now on the table, I had the honor to offer at the last session. I then thought that we ought to adopt them, and some reflection and observation, added to some occurrences which have taken place during the last and the present session, have confirmed me in that opinion, and that we ought to do it without delay. Could I, however, be taught to believe that, thereby we should, in the most distant manner, violate the Constitution, which I have sworn to support, or the contract which we have made with the proprietors of land within the City of Washington; that we should impede its growth or prosperity, or do an injury to any part of the District of Columbia, I would immediately withdraw my support and give to them my opposition. The contrary are my firm convictions, formed after some experience and much reflection; and with a disposition most friendly to the City of Washington; a disposition which I have evinced on several occasions, and on none more than on the vote I shall give on this day. I do believe that, by the adoption of these resolutions, we shall give life and enterprise to the City of Washington; that we shall more truly establish it as the seat of our Government; that we shall free our national treasury from a heavy annual expense; and, above all, that we shall raise a number of respectable men from the humble and degraded state in which they now stand, to the more dignified one of citizens; these being the honest and disinterested convictions of my own mind, and these the advantages, it will not be a matter of surprise that I am an advocate of these resolutions. What are the objections, and what are the disadvantages, I know not, and as I have not ingenuity to anticipate, I must wait until gentlemen will furnish us with them, when they shall be acknowledged, or receive such answers as they appear to merit.

Without entering into the merits of this question, I must beg leave to mention one fact, which may meet an argument which I expect will be used here, as it has been elsewhere, and which has excited some alarm and some doubt with persons friendly to this city, as to the retrocession. It has been believed that there is connexion between the law fixing this as the permanent seat of Government, and that assuming the jurisdiction, and that a partial repeal of the latter will endanger the other; than this, in my judgment, no opinion can be more incorrect; the laws themselves are separate and independent, and the objects of them different and distinct, the one passed in 1790, the other in 1801; and here, sir, permit me to observe that the last law passed subsequent to the death of that person whose spirit a gentleman from Maryland has thought proper to introduce, and in my judgment, very improperly on the present occasion. I will not, however, believe that that person, if alive, would give his support to a law which goes to the destruction of those principles, in the attainment of which his whole life had been spent, or that he would have countenanced the doctrines advanced by that gentleman on this day.

Mr. DENNIS rose and explained.

Mr. DAWSON replied, that he had supposed that gentleman meant to apply his observations to the subject under consideration, which was a repeal of the law divesting the inhabitants of the District of the right of representation—and then proceeded: By the first, this is established as the permanent seat of Government, and a solemn contract entered into between the proprietors of land within the city, whereby they relinquished one-half to the General Government. This, sir, forms the obligation of the contract, from which we cannot depart without a violation of the public faith, and to do which I shall ever be found among the last.

The other was an act left to the discretion of Congress, which they might pass or not, according to their pleasure, and which could not, by any possible construction, affect the original contract, which would have been equally secure without it, and, in my judgment, more so. It was passed, and strange to tell, it was passed to gratify the wishes of a majority of this District, without any consideration on their part—for, be it remembered, that they have not made relinquishments to the Government, or contributions to the establishment of the city. I hope it will not long remain a stain in our code. I voted against it, and I have ever felt anxious to confirm that vote by advocating its repeal.

Mr. CHAIRMAN, to posterity and to the present age, it must appear a matter of astonishment, that at the seat of our representative Government, where it is presumed that its principles are understood, and within a few years after its adoption, a number of our most respectable citizens, some of whom had fought, and many of whom had contended for eight years for the rights of representation—on which all our other political rights are founded—come forward and pray you to divest them of it. Sir, when I cast my eyes on the table, and examine its contents, I am almost induced to doubt the reason of my senses; at the same moment, I behold a memorial from the inhabitants of Louisiana, just freed from the shackles of an arbitrary Government, written in the enthusiastic spirit of freedom, imploring you to grant to them the right of representation, as the first gift of God to man, and I espy the petition of the inhabitants of Columbia, the seat of our representative Government, begging you to divest them of that right, and to reduce or rather continue them in a state which the Louisianians esteem a degraded one. Whence, sir, does this arise? Where is the spirit which animated those persons—many of whom I know and respect—when, in 1776, they demanded representation or death? Has it expired in a few short years, or is it to be bartered “for as much trash as may be granted them?”—for a supposed increased value in their property? I hope, sir, we shall not be instruments to the contract, or the trustees for its performance.

These observations, Mr. CHAIRMAN, may answer to one which has been frequently made—“that a majority of the inhabitants of the District are opposed to the retrocession.” Be that as it may, it has no weight on my mind. I am not disposed to adopt as my political guardians, or to appoint as the trustees of the rights of others, men who have voluntarily relinquished their own, and that right on which all others depend, the right of representation. However highly I may personally esteem, as I do, many of the characters, politically speaking, I view them as non-entities. I wish they were not.

Mr. D. then argued in favor of the Constitutional right of Congress to repeal the law, and contended that there was not any connexion between the law establishing the City of Washington as the permanent seat of the Government, and the one assuming the jurisdiction over the District of Columbia; the first of them formed the obligation of the contract, for a valuable consideration, and for the performance of which the public faith was pledged; the passage of the second was left to the discretion of Congress, and might be repealed at their pleasure. To the several precedents which had been adduced to show the Constitutional right, he begged leave to add one which had not been mentioned, and which, in his judgment, was conclusive. The same section in the Constitution which gave Congress the right to assume the jurisdiction over the territory, gave them the right to "constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court." The latter right has been exercised; inferior courts have been established, and completely organized. Judges were appointed, and the system went into operation; and yet, sir, two years ago, a large majority of this Congress thought that they had a right to repeal that law and put down the system. I now call on gentlemen, and I particularly invite those who favored that repeal, to show me a difference in the exercise of the two rights—except, indeed, that by that repeal you virtually discontinued officers who had received commissions, and which was relied on by the opponents to the repeal as their strong ground.

He concluded by saying, that, as there was no Constitutional bar, in his judgment, the interests of the city would be advanced by freeing it of useless encumbrances, which impeded its growth; that the parts of the District without the city would be benefitted by returning to their parent States; that the national treasury would be freed from a heavy annual unnecessary payment, which might go to the redemption of our public debt, or of our fellow-citizens in captivity; and above all, as it would raise a number of respectable persons from the unequal situation in which they now stand to the more dignified one of American citizens, he should vote in favor of the resolutions, and hoped for their adoption.

Mr. GODDARD said he should not have risen on this occasion to discuss a subject already exhausted, but for the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia last up (Mr. DAWSON.) If, said Mr. G., I understand that gentleman right, he stated that two acts had been passed by Congress over it—the one in the year 1790, the other in 1801—that the first act authorized the acceptance of a cession of a district of country, not exceeding ten miles square; the second, passed in 1801, assumed the jurisdiction over this territory—and that we have nothing to do but repeal this last act, and the jurisdiction reverts back to the States of Virginia and Maryland, from which it was derived. If this position be well founded, I should agree with that gentleman in one part of his argument, viz: that we have a Constitutional right to recede this territory, or in other words, repeal the act of 1801; but I think that position not well founded. In 1790, Congress passed an act authorizing the President to accept a cession of territory, to become the permanent seat of Government of the United States. The States of Virginia and Maryland made the cession accordingly. This done, the territory, as well as the jurisdiction over it, so far as they belonged to those States, was completely acquired by the United States. The States of Virginia and Maryland parted with all their right. The moment they made the several cessions the jurisdiction resided in the United States. Congress might not immediately begin the exercise of jurisdiction, but the right to do it was complete. By a recurrence to the act of 1790, I find a proviso annexed to the first section, in these words: "Provided nevertheless, that the operation of the laws of the State within such district, shall not be affected by such acceptance, until the time fixed for the removal of the Government thereto, and until Congress shall otherwise by law provide." Congress, aware that it might not be convenient immediately to organize a government for this district, made provision for the operation of the laws of Virginia and Maryland, until such organization should take place. It hence results that as the laws of Virginia and Maryland were in operation here prior to the act of 1801, yet they were so under the sole authority of Congress; unless indeed, those States in the acts of cession made a reservation of jurisdiction until Congress should organize a government. Of this I am not certain; but if it be so, it makes no difference, because all the pretension on the part of these States to exercise jurisdiction, ceased when the event happened to which the reservation had reference, and, until that time, its exercise was sanctioned by the act of 1790. No jurisdiction therefore was acquired by the act of 1801. That act organized a government, provided for the erection of courts, the appointment of public officers, &c. Suppose we should repeal that act, what would be the consequence? Would the jurisdiction be thereby restored to Virginia and Maryland? Not at all. Congress might the same day pass another act, organizing the government in the same or in a different manner. The jurisdiction would still reside in the United States, and all the legislative power which could be in exercise here, must be exercised by Congress until we pass an affirmative act receding the jurisdiction to those States. And here permit me to inquire whether this does not furnish an answer to all the arguments which have been drawn from the analogy between the power which is given by the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, authorizing Congress to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over this territory, and the clauses in the same section giving to Congress other powers? And whether the true difference does not consist in this, that in all the other cases we may pass laws and repeal them at pleasure, and the power will continue the same? In this case we are called upon to do more than repeal a law—doing that would not effect the object.

By other clauses in the same section of the first article of the Constitution, power is given to Congress to establish an uniform system of naturalization, uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies, establish post offices and post roads, &c. Gentlemen say, and very correctly, that in these cases Congress may, or may not, exercise the powers given by the Constitution—may pass laws this Congress and repeal them the next. This is doubtless true; and if by repealing the act of 1801 a recession would take place, and a future Congress could enact another law, the argument would hold. But we must pass a law ceding the jurisdiction. This once done Congress can never resume it, or again exercise the power given by the Constitution to legislate exclusively for this district while it remains the seat of the Government of the United States. Do we not, therefore, instead of repealing a law, in effect repeal one of the provisions of the Constitution and render it a dead letter? Can we fairly get along in any other manner than by considering the acquisition of this territory and the jurisdiction over it as one thing, and the constant exercise of legislative power here as another? As it respects the first, may we not consider the Constitution as functus officio—as having produced the effect which was intended? As it respects the last, we may repeal all the laws in operation here for the government of the territory, and still the right to govern may belong to Congress. And can we part with this right?

I am sensible, however, that difficulties attend this construction of the Constitution. I say construction, because I believe it cannot safely be affirmed, that there are any plain, positive words which decide the question in debate. We must resort to construction to ascertain the meaning of language. One objection to this construction, as forcible perhaps, as any which has been urged, arises from the succeeding clauses of the same paragraph of the same section: "And to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State, in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, dock-yards, and other needful buildings." Whatever may be our authority here, it is the same with respect to places purchased for forts, arsenals, &c. It will doubtless be found to be very inconvenient in practice, to adopt such a construction of the Constitution as would compel Congress to exercise this exclusive legislation forever over those places. Forts may be erected this year upon our frontiers. Hereafter when the country becomes settled, those places are no longer frontiers, and forts are no longer necessary. Exclusive legislation ought no longer to be exercised there by Congress. I can answer this objection only by resorting to known rules of construction, one of which is, that regard is always to be had to the subject-matter about which the instrument is conversant. Give it such a construction as that the object intended to be effected shall rather prevail than be destroyed.

In the one case, the object unquestionably was to obtain a permanent seat of Government for the United States; in the other, a temporary place for the exercise of military power so long as the condition of the country about it rendered it necessary. The United States must always have a place for the seat of the Government, somewhere; forts may not always be necessary anywhere.

The argument of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. CLARK) I cannot think is so conclusive as that gentleman seems to consider it. According to his argument, we are to find positive authority for parting with the jurisdiction of this territory, in the words of the Constitution, which have been so often read, "Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatever." He says that the act which we shall pass to recede, is a legislative act, and we, in possession of all legislative power here, in all cases, have a right to exercise it in this, as well as any other case." The power then, which must be a subsisting one, to govern this territory exclusively, contains in it a power to deprive ourselves, and every future Congress, of the right of governing it at all, or of exercising any legislation here! But I am ready to admit that the question, whether we may constitutionally recede this territory, is a doubtful one, about which gentlemen may very well differ. But not perceiving the necessity or expediency of doing it, in that strong light in which it presents itself to some gentlemen, and entertaining doubts about the Constitutional right to do so, I shall vote against it. Before I sit down, I cannot but notice one remark, which fell from the mover of this resolution, Mr. STANFORD. In representing the degraded situation of the people of this territory, he told us that they were wholly destitute of rights, and even the privilege of petitioning Congress was a matter of courtesy, not of right. Will that gentleman read the Constitution of the United States, and make this declaration in his place? Among the amendments which have been adopted to that instrument, the first article is in these words: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." All laws which are or can be made for the government of this territory must be made by Congress. And we can no more pass an act, to operate here, which is repugnant to the principles and provisions of the Constitution, than we can, to operate in any other part of the Union. I cannot therefore but express my surprise at the declaration made by the gentleman from North Carolina, as well as others of a similar import. Gentlemen claim the exercise of power here, which is not only dangerous, but expressly denied us by the Constitution, which we are bound to support.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL rose with great reluctance, at this late hour, to detain the Committee that had so long been engaged in the investigation of this subject; but he could not consent to give a silent vote on the question now under discussion, while arguments were used which he considered untenable, and which, if unanswered, might be considered abroad as governing the decision that should be made. He would therefore claim the indulgence of the Committee, while he submitted, very briefly, some of the reasons that would influence the vote he was about to give. In examining the subject he would consider the question with regard to the Constitutional power Congress may have to remove the seat of Government as separate and distinct from the question whether, in the present state of things, they have a Constitutional right to recede the territory, or a part of it, while the seat of Government remained within it. He proposed, therefore, to consider, first, whether Congress have power constitutionally to carry into complete effect the proposed measure without first removing the seat of Government; and, secondly, if they have such power, whether there exists at present such a state of things as requires the exercise of that power. In order to comprehend the first view of the subject that he had proposed laying before the Committee, it would be necessary to recur to the Constitutional provision on the subject, and to the acts that have taken place in pursuance thereof. By a clause of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, often alluded to in this discussion, it is provided that "the Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States," &c. This was a Constitutional provision by which the power to exercise exclusive legislation, &c., might become vested in Congress upon certain events taking place. Let us now inquire what were these events? and we shall find by the terms of the provision, that, in order to vest this power completely in Congress, two things only were necessary; first, a cession by particular States of a district, (not exceeding ten miles square;) secondly, the acceptance of such district by Congress as the seat of the Government of the United States. These things have taken place. A cession has been made of a district not exceeding ten miles square, by Legislative acts of the States of Virginia and Maryland, (which need not now be recurred to, not being in dispute,) and the said district was accepted as the seat of the Government of the United States by an act of Congress passed in July, 1790, and the territory of Columbia located pursuant thereto. The moment, therefore, that these previous requisites were complied with, the power to exercise exclusive legislation over such territory became vested in Congress by a Constitutional provision, and they could exercise it at any time afterwards at pleasure. They have accordingly assumed, and for some years exercised, the power of exclusive legislation within the said territory. This power being once fully and completely vested in Congress, by virtue of a Constitutional provision, (not as an individual that could alienate or abridge such powers, but as a body politic that cannot by their acts bind up the hands of their successors, or abridge their powers,) it cannot be divested from them, while the seat of Government remains in such territory, by any authority inferior to that from which it was derived. They may omit to exercise it, and for the present relinquish the jurisdiction, but they cannot by any act prevent a future Congress from resuming it, if they should be disposed to do so. Nothing can effectually annul the authority of Congress to exercise exclusive legislation within this district, while the seat of Government remains therein, but an amendment to the Constitution, a revocation equally as strong as the grant that vested the power. He called upon gentlemen to show in what way a Constitutional power once vested in Congress could be transferred, or how the right to exercise it could be so discontinued as to prevent a future Congress from resuming it by a repeal of the law, if the present Congress should pass one on the subject. He himself did not conceive it proper, or consistent with the fundamental principles of legislation, to give his assent to an act, the effect of which would be an attempt to abridge the powers of a future Congress. He would now notice an argument used by a gentleman from Virginia last up on this subject, (Mr. DAWSON,) which he believed when fairly examined would be consistent with, and support the position he (Mr. C.) had taken. That gentleman stated, that by the Constitution Congress had power to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court, that they had exercised that power and established circuit courts, and that Congress by a subsequent law abolished those courts, repealing the law by which they had been established, and hence he infers that Congress may recede the territory as they may repeal the act by which the exclusive jurisdiction of the same was assumed. He supposed the gentleman would admit, that this or any future Congress could re-enact the Judiciary system that had been abolished, or constitute other tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court, if they deemed it expedient so to do. This would not be denied. So far, therefore, as this case applied, he conceived it proved beyond a reasonable doubt, that should the present Congress relinquish the exclusive jurisdiction of this district, any future Congress could resume it at pleasure so long as it remained the seat of Government of the United States. For, as repealing the Judiciary law, and abolishing the circuit courts, did not deprive Congress of the power to re-enact the same system, or establish other inferior tribunals, neither would, by a parity of reasoning, a recession of the territory, or a relinquishment of the exclusive jurisdiction, deprive a future Congress of the power of resuming the same. In what situation will you put the people of this district by a recession? If the position he had stated was correct, which he firmly believed to be the case, the States of Maryland and Virginia would refuse to receive them as citizens, knowing that a future Congress may wrest them away from their control whenever they shall be disposed to resume the exclusive jurisdiction over them. It is admitted the States are not bound to receive them, and this power to resume the jurisdiction, which would still remain in Congress, would be a substantial reason why they should not. The inhabitants would then be left without protectors or legislators, exposed to all the ruinous effects of anarchy and confusion. He considered it the duty of Congress to exercise exclusive legislation, either directly or indirectly, over the District of Columbia while it continued to be the seat of Government. Whether this was the most eligible place for a permanent seat of Government was a distinct question, on which he gave no opinion; at present he was not disposed to disturb it. But that Congress should have the power of exercising exclusive legislation over such district as might be made the seat of Government, was, in his opinion, proper, and a wise regulation, and much superior to leaving the protection of the National Government to the State authorities, and subjecting the Legislature of the Union to the inconveniences that might arise from the State regulations, or from the regulations that might be adopted by corporations not subject to the control of Congress.

An argument had been advanced by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. CLARK,) to prove that Congress had a right to recede, which, though it might appear ingenious, he conceived was not tenable, and could not be supported upon a fair investigation. It is insisted that the very article of the Constitution that vests in Congress the power of exercising exclusive legislation over such district as should become the seat of Government, does thereby, necessarily, vest in Congress the power to recede such territory; and the gentleman said, "we have the power to exercise exclusive legislation within such district in all cases whatsoever, we must therefore have the power to recede." This was a conclusion not warranted by, or deducible from the premises. For the power to exercise exclusive legislation within a certain district, precludes the power of transferring that right, or power, or vesting the same in another. While the power remains in Congress a transfer of it is impossible, and the very act by which you would transfer this power (which would be the consequence of a recession, if it could be completely effected) would destroy its existence in Congress. That is, a power would be vested in Congress, by a Constitutional provision, which would be exerted to destroy or extinguish itself, and in so doing vest the right of exercising their power in another, which he conceived next to an absurdity. In fact the two propositions, of the power to exercise exclusive legislation, being vested in Congress, by a Constitutional provision, and the right to destroy or transfer that power being vested by, or necessarily included in the same provision, are in direct opposition, the one to the other, and like negative and positive quantities in algebra would destroy each other. He called upon gentlemen to show how the doctrine contended for could be supported, according to any known system of reasoning. If they could prove that the power of exercising exclusive legislation necessarily embraced the right to destroy that power, or to deprive themselves and their successors of it, they would discover a mode of reasoning with which he was not acquainted, and establish a kind of logical deduction, he believed, hitherto altogether unknown.

He would now consider the subject in the second point of view, which he proposed, to wit, whether, if Congress possessed the power to recede the territory, there existed at present such a state of things as required the exercise of that power. He would ask was it good policy to recede at this time? Is there anything imperious that demands the measure at our hands? Would it not argue a restlessness and a disposition to change, to which mankind are in general so prone, but which he conceived ought to be checked and kept within proper bounds, that sufficient time at least might be given for fair and mature deliberation. Two reasons he had heard advanced and principally relied upon to prove the expediency of this measure—one, that the people of the District are in a state of slavery, and Congress their masters, and that having voluntarily relinquished their civil and political rights, and appearing willing to remain in this state of vassalage, they would be fit engines to enslave the rest of the Union. The other, that they are continually troubling the House and wasting our time, with their petitions and counter-petitions, their memorials and remonstrances. If the people of Columbia are now slaves, he would ask what was their condition when under the States to which they originally belonged before they were ceded to Congress? By an express provision in the act of Congress assuming the jurisdiction, the laws of the States of Virginia and Maryland, as they then existed, were declared to be continued in force in the said territory. The rights of the people were, therefore, secured to them, as far as was in the power of Congress, by this measure; and they enjoy, substantially, the same portion of civil liberty which they formerly possessed. He was also inclined to believe that some respect ought to be paid to the opinion which the people themselves form of their present condition; he could not suppose them so ignorant as not to know the difference between a state of slavery, in which they had been represented to be, and that of civil liberty; and yet we hear no complaints from them on this subject. He was, however, in principle, opposed to the doctrine of governing a people who did not enjoy the representative franchise; his political maxim on this subject was, that, in general, those who contribute to the support of Government ought to partake in the administration of it; but he conceived there might exist such a state of things as would render it more politic, and better for the people, to deviate in some degree from this maxim, than to risk the inconveniences that might arise from a too strict adherence thereto. He would promote any Constitutional measure that would give the inhabitants of Columbia the benefits of the representative principle. This he conceived might be substantially effected, by giving them a legislature, whose acts should be subject to the control of Congress. This would obviate in a great degree the objections that are made to the present condition of these people, on account of the trouble they gave Congress and the time that is spent in legislating for them—and would leave little room to charge Congress with keeping them in a state of slavery, in the bosom of a country enjoying the most perfect liberty of any upon earth. But the people of Columbia by being degraded are to become fit engines to enslave the rest of the nation. He was sorry such an alarm was sounded at this time, when, he presumed, there was little cause for it. Did gentlemen judge from the present state of those people, or did they look forward to a time when this place was to become a second Rome, prostituted and corrupted by luxury and vice, the grave of liberty, and the scourge of the rest of mankind? He trusted those days that produced such events were long since passed, and, in the present enlightened age, not likely to return. But whence, he asked, can proceed the danger from the inhabitants of Columbia? Are they more corrupt than the rest of the Union? Are they more ignorant, or less alive to their rights and liberties? He had no reason to believe that this was the case. Is there any reason to suppose they will become enslaved under the government of Congress? Will those to whom are confided the rights and liberties of the whole Union, sacrifice the people of Columbia, by degrading them to a state of vassalage? Will not the members of the National Legislature bring with them the feelings of the people in the different parts of the Union from which they come? He presumed they would, and legislate for this district, in the same manner, as far as circumstances would permit, that they would for their constituents. If therefore the people at large enjoyed liberty and equal rights, so would the inhabitants of Columbia; they had their rights and liberty guaranteed to them by the Representatives of the whole nation.

Mr. C. concluded by observing that the framers of the Constitution, and the State conventions that adopted it, who spoke the sentiments of the great body of the people of the Union, must have intended that there should be established a permanent seat for the National Government; and being convinced of this, from such high authorities, he would, by no act of his, countenance a measure, that would be likely to shake the confidence of the people in the public faith, give the appearance of instability to our national act, and finally tend to loosen the bonds by which the seat of Government was bound to this district. Believing the proposed resolution calculated to produce such effects, he had determined to vote against it, and he trusted that a large and decided majority of the House would coincide with him in opinion, and by rejecting the measure quiet the alarms it had occasioned, and evince to the public that some reliance, at least, may be placed in the stability of Government.

Mr. RHEA (of Tennessee).—Having attended with pleasure to the discussion of the question now under consideration, I had designed as on every question heretofore, so also on this, to have given a silent vote, but I have felt myself constrained to state the reasons which govern this vote.

As this discussion may lead me to examine certain principles, I will take this opportunity to express my veneration for the superior wisdom which dictated them.

At the time the Constitution of the United States became obligatory on the particular States, they were bounded by ascertained limits; the sovereignty, jurisdiction, and right of each particular State, within its territorial limits, were secured, and the rights, privileges, immunities and franchises of the citizens were safe under the respective State constitutions.

The constitution of Virginia, after stating a relinquishment of claim to the territories contained within the charters erecting Pennsylvania, Maryland, North Carolina and South Carolina, proceeds to declare that, "the western and northern limits of Virginia shall in all other respects stand as fixed by the charter of King James the First, in the year one thousand six hundred and nine; and by the public treaty of peace between the Courts of Britain and France, in the year 1763; unless by act of this Legislature one or more governments be established westward of the Alleghany mountains."

The words used in this clause of the constitution of Virginia are, "shall stand as fixed," to evince that the limits of that State were unalterable, except as in the same clause is provided.

The constitution of Virginia, also declares expressly that "the right of suffrage shall remain as exercised at present;" the word "shall" is here again used, to evince that the right of suffrage was secured to every citizen, as an inalienable right, a right which, by the force of the terms, could not be surrendered.

The third article of the declaration of rights and constitution of the State of Maryland declares that "the inhabitants of Maryland are entitled to all property derived to them from or under the charter granted by His Majesty Charles the First, to Cecilius Calvert, Baron of Baltimore." And the fifth article secures the right of suffrage to the citizens.

It would appear, by these express, unqualified declarations in the constitutions of the States of Virginia and Maryland, that the territorial limits of those States were made fixed and unalterable, except as to the making one or more governments westward of the Alleghany mountains, provided for in that of Virginia; and it does not appear, that any power is delegated in either of the same constitutions, to alter or change the territorial limits of either State, (excepting that, by the constitution of Virginia, one or more governments might be established westward of the Alleghany mountains,) or to cede any part of the territory of either to any other Power. There does not appear in either of the same constitutions, any expression of the public will, delegating power to cede away any of the citizens of either State, or, by a cession, to place them in a condition deprived of the rights of suffrage.

But it may be objected that the cessions of territory and citizen inhabitants which are stated to be made, were made after the ceding States had adopted the Constitution of the United States, and that the Constitution being the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution of any State to the contrary notwithstanding, therefore the clauses and articles in the constitutions of the States of Virginia and Maryland, before alluded to, so far as they would have reference to a portion of territory and citizen inhabitants to be ceded, were made null and void.

It is acknowledged that this objection may appear to have some claim to examination; but, if examined, it will appear to have no force.

It will be observed that there is no clause, section, or article in the Constitution of the United States imperiously commanding any particular State in this Union to cede territory to the United States for any purpose. An imperious command to cede territory could not be made. The second article of the Confederation and perpetual Union of the United States declares that "each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by this Confederation expressly delegated to the United States, in Congress assembled."

This article operates as a guarantee by the United States to every particular State; and the second clause of the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States declares that "nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or of any particular State." Hence it may be inferred that this objection is without force.

This objection will appear more untenable by an examination of the seventeenth clause of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, (the clause on which the claim "to exercise exclusive jurisdiction in all cases whatsoever," &c., in the District of Columbia is bottomed,) the words used in this clause are not imperious—they do not command any particular State or States to cede territory to the United States; neither do they impose an imperious necessity to accept such cession from any particular State.

This clause indirectly presents a proposition to the particular States; the words used are, "over such District (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States;" by this mode of expression, it is evident that it was understood that every particular State had the right, under its own particular constitution, to reject this proposition.

Hence it may be concluded that the articles and clauses in the constitutions of the States of Virginia and Maryland, before alluded to, are not impaired by the Constitution of the United States.

In the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution, it is expressly declared that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government." This is a strong expression; when it is recollected by whom it is made, it will appear stronger. It is the voice of the sovereign people of this Union, before whose presence, at whose command, every fabric that they have not ordained to be erected must fall and moulder into ruin.

The words of the Constitution are, "WE," emphatically. "WE, the people of the United States, shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government." No book of political institute, ancient or modern, can produce an expression of the public will equal to this.

By the word "State," in this section, is not intended or signified mere soil or territory. No: by it is intended and signified a citizen-people, inhabiting a territory bounded by limits ascertained in their constitution. To these citizen-people comprising every State in this Union, we the people of the United States have guaranteed a republican form of government.

At the time the Constitution of the United States became the supreme law of the land, the people inhabiting what is now the District of Columbia are presumed to have been, some of them citizens of the State of Virginia, the residue citizens of the State of Maryland, therefore, were respectively component part of those States, and were embraced by the emphatical word "WE," which stands first in the preamble of the Constitution. They, therefore, being component parts of the States of Virginia and Maryland, guaranteed to all the people composing every State in this Union a republican form of government; and all the people composing every State in this Union guaranteed a republican form of government to them. This guarantee was and is mutual and reciprocal. No citizen was excepted or excluded, and it cannot be made to appear that any citizen is or can be excepted or excluded from the operation of this principle declared in this fourth section of the fourth article of our Constitution.

This principle is capable of further illustration, evincing its power in aid of the State constitutions.

The citizens composing every State in this Union who have made and ordained a constitution, have, by that constitution, mutually guaranteed to each other a republican form of government. At this point, the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of each particular State meet and continue to protect every citizen of every State in this Union in the possession and exercise of his liberties, privileges, and franchises, under a republican form of government.

If, then, these things be so, no good reason can be urged why any section of citizens shall be retained and confined under the dominion of a principle hostile to the grand principles which form the basis of the American Republic. As has already been observed, there does not appear to have been any imperious necessity compelling any particular State to cede territory and the citizen-inhabitants. There does not appear to have been any imperious necessity compelling the acceptance of any such cession; but it is understood that the States of Virginia and Maryland have made cessions of territory composing the District of Columbia and the citizen-inhabitants thereof to the United States, and they have been accepted, and by that acceptance many thousands of citizens have been deprived of rights and privileges, the possession and exercise of which, under a republican form of government, were solemnly guaranteed to them.

If there has been a splendid departure from principle to obtain an object not yet known, more than is the benefit from the cession resulting to the United States, to any particular State, or to any citizen in this Union, it may be most advisable to return, and to remove any impediment that may prevent the free operation of a republican form of government.

With this view of the subject, I shall vote in favor of the resolutions, impressed with an assured, solemn belief that it is my duty so to do. What remains is, to offer my grateful acknowledgments for the attention with which I have been honored.

Mr. LEWIS.—Mr. Chairman: Hitherto I, having been silent upon the question under consideration, have been too much indisposed to do justice either to myself or the importance of the subject. After the very lengthy and able investigation of the resolution upon your table, it is with great unwillingness that I intrude upon the Committee at this late hour, when their patience must be exhausted, and when it is not probable that much new light can be thrown upon the subject. But upon a question so very interesting, and in its consequences so important, I am desirous of assigning some of the reasons which have determined me to give to these resolutions my decided negative. I am opposed to the resolutions for a retrocession of the District of Columbia, or any part of it, for two reasons: first, because, in my opinion, Congress do not possess the Constitutional power to pass them; and, secondly, because (even admitting they possessed the power) it would be inexpedient. I consider that, if the retrocession should take place, that a removal of the seat of Government would certainly follow, and the fundamental principles of the Government would be shaken to the centre. Such a measure I will never consent to sanction, and while I have the honor of a seat in this House, my voice shall be raised against it. I will never vote for a measure that shall in the most distant manner have a tendency to impair the principles upon which this District is based. Before Congress can retrocede the District, or any part thereof, not only the States of Virginia and Maryland, but the people of the District, must give their consent. The latter certainly had a right to the benefits of the Constitution, and cannot be transferred, without their consent, to any State whatever. But the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. EARLY) has said that the people of the Territory of Columbia had not been consulted when they were ceded to Congress, and that therefore their consent was not necessary on this occasion. Is this correct, sir? No; it is not a fact that they had no voice in the cession. They were represented in the Convention which ratified it, and they were represented in the State Legislatures who gave their assent to the cession. Their assent was necessary—it was obtained. The territory was ceded for those purposes expressed in the Constitution, and for those purposes only did the people consent to relinquish their sovereign rights. What were those purposes? That the ceded territory should be the permanent seat of the Government of the United States, and that Congress should exercise exclusive legislation over it. These were the express terms upon which the cession was made and accepted by Congress, and will it now be said that we can transfer or barter away these people like cattle? No, sir; they still have rights which they cannot be deprived of, without a shameful violation of justice and public faith. How have these resolutions been introduced? Has the State of Virginia or the State of Maryland expressed a desire that a retrocession should take place? I believe not. Have the people of the District who are to be affected by it petitioned in its favor? No; but the reverse is the fact. Resolutions have been received from the town and county of Alexandria denying the right of Congress to transfer them without their consent; petitions have been received from Georgetown and the City of Washington against it, and not one person in the District has come forward and complained of not being restored to his "long lost liberty." And I would ask whether the wishes of the people ought not to be regarded; and whether Congress will retrocede them in defiance of their will? I trust not. If Congress possess the power to transfer them to the States of Virginia and Maryland, they can transfer them to any other State in the Union, or (as the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. DENNIS, has said) to the Emperor of Hayti. I trust that no gentleman of the Committee would be willing to do the latter. But gentlemen have said that the people of the District were troublesome to Congress. I never expected, sir, to have heard such a declaration upon this floor. The people have a right, by the Constitution, to petition for a redress of their grievances, and Congress is bound to listen to them; for, although deprived of an immediate representation, yet they are still the people of the United States, and, as such, are entitled to all the privileges of the Constitution, except that of being represented. If because the people are troublesome we are to transfer the District, the same reason might be assigned in favor of ceding any State to a foreign Power. But why, let me ask, sir, do not gentlemen propose a retrocession of Louisiana? Surely that province has been more troublesome than the District of Columbia, and the prospect is that it will be twenty times more so. But it is urged, as an argument in favor of the retrocession, that the District is small. And are we, Mr. Chairman, arrived at that period when justice shall be measured and limited by miles and bounds? If this be the case, then the little State of Delaware will, when compared with the State of Virginia, only be entitled to a proportion of justice as one is to twenty-two. This, I hope, is not the case yet.

The expense of legislating for the District has also been urged; but, in my opinion, it is neither troublesome nor expensive. If Congress have devoted some time to the affairs of the District, it must be recollected that they have devoted more to a number of individual cases. Will gentlemen look at the case of Amy Darden's horse, about which more time has been spent than about all the business of the District. I lament that the claim of this poor woman (which I have always considered just) should still be a subject of legislation and remain unpaid; but it has never been contended that the expense of legislating should prevent persons from having justice. Gentlemen have deplored the degraded situation of the people of this District. I acknowledge, sir, they are in a degraded situation; not because Congress exercised exclusive legislation over them, but because they contended for the right to transfer them without their consent, like so many cattle, (or slaves and nonentities, as they have been termed by gentlemen.) But how will the people in the county of Alexandria be restored to their "long lost liberty" by a retrocession to Virginia? Do not gentlemen know that in Virginia none but freeholders have the privilege of voting, and but a small proportion of the people would be restored to that inestimable right, and would be precisely in the situation in which they are at present in that respect?

JANUARY, 1805.

H. OF R.

After the able arguments which have been adduced against the resolutions, I will not detain the Committee with any further observations, but will content myself with giving to them my decided negative, and hope a majority of the Committee will not be found to sanction a measure fraught with such pernicious consequences.

THURSDAY, January 10.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchants' service.'" Whereupon, the amendment, together with the bill, was committed to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Ordered, That the committee to whom was referred, on the fourth instant, a remonstrance and petition of the representatives elected by the free-men of the Territory of Louisiana be discharged from the consideration thereof; and that the said remonstrance and petition be referred to the committee appointed on the twelfth of November last, on "so much of the Message of the President of the United States, as relates to an amelioration of the form of government of the Territory of Louisiana;" that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on a motion of the twenty-ninth of November last, "to recede to the States of Virginia and Maryland the jurisdiction of such parts of the Territory of Columbia, as are without the limits of the City of Washington."

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina: Mr. Chairman, the length of time which has already been occupied in discussing the resolutions now under consideration, would have prevented me from saying anything at this late hour, but from some expressions which gentlemen have made use of by saying, that those who were opposed to the resolutions had in a measure given up the Constitutional objection, therefore they could see no solid reason why they ought not to be adopted. But I did not understand that objection was abandoned, and for my own part I consider that if the resolutions do pass they are contrary to the true meaning of the Constitution. Under these considerations I hope I shall be indulged whilst I offer to the Committee some remarks, and state my ideas on that clause of the Constitution which has so often been read and commented on.

The first article and eighth section of the Constitution, declaring the powers of Congress, in the last clause, says that Congress shall exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States. And we are now told by those who wish to recede this district, that, although the States of Virginia and Maryland have ceded to the Congress of the United States this district, and it has been accepted, that Congress can now recede whatever they think proper; this position I deny, and will endeavor to state what I think to be the true construction of that section of the Constitution. The powers which are delegated to Congress in the eighth section may be exercised or not, but the power still exists in Congress, and I take it that Congress cannot by an act of their own destroy the powers delegated to them by the Constitution; if they can it would be a useless instrument. But gentlemen have said that it would be very absurd if Congress could not repeal any law which they have passed; they certainly can, but does it follow from that, that the power ceases which was given by the Constitution? No, sir, it still remains discretionary in Congress to exercise whenever necessary. I shall therefore contend that the clause of the Constitution under which this district was formed depends on the same principle; that is, it cannot be receded and changed at the will and pleasure of Congress. I believe the convention by inserting that section intended there should be a permanent seat of Government, although they did not fix on the particular place where it should be, but left it in the power of Congress to carry that clause into operation. This has been done by a cession from the State of Virginia and Maryland, and accepted by Congress; that clause, therefore, being now made complete as any of the preceding clauses in that section, it is equally binding on us, as much so as if the district had been laid off by the convention.

But we are told that this district has been formed by an act of Congress, and of course they can dispose of it at pleasure. I admit it required Legislative aid for its completion; and all the powers which were contemplated under that clause being completely vested in Congress, they are bound by it as much as any other part of the Constitution. Will not, then, a recession of this district destroy the object intended by that section, because, without this district, Congress have no power to exercise exclusive legislation, and that clause will be a mere nullity? There is another reason why I think Congress have no power to recede this district. When the Constitution of the United States was adopted, it was well understood that such a district, not exceeding ten miles square, would be laid off for the seat of Government. I therefore think that Congress have no more power to recede or dispose of it than any one of the States which have been formed and admitted into the Union, by an act of Congress, agreeable to the fourth article and third section of the Constitution. If, then, this district stands upon the same principle as the new States, gentlemen will not contend that they can dispose of those States at pleasure, for having been admitted into the Confederation, they stand upon the same footing with respect to being transferred as any of the States, which were in existence at the adoption of the Constitution. If, therefore, Congress have no power to dispose of one of the States belonging to the Union, except in cases of extreme necessity, for the safety of the nation, they cannot this district, both being formed agreeably to the express provision in the Constitution. To prove this, they have referred to the fourth article and third section, which says, that Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States. But, Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen will strictly examine that clause of the Constitution they will see it does not apply to the question now before us, it only relates to the territory belonging to the United States; for the boundary was laid down before the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and it was well known there was a vast extensive territory which Congress would have to dispose of, which they are continually selling, and extending our territory, by extinguishing the Indian claims, and that is the true reason why we see that clause inserted in our Constitution.

Gentlemen have contended that the receding the jurisdiction of this District has no connexion with the removal of the seat of Government, and they have no such intention. I have no reason to doubt the declarations of gentlemen, but if the resolutions which they are in favor of should be adopted, it will have the same effect; because, if Congress can dispose of the District at pleasure, our seat of Government will be afloat; and although there may not be a majority of the members now in Congress who wish to remove the seat of Government, a few years hence there may be; and if the Constitution has no control over us, that clause is useless, and our seat of Government will be removed at the will and pleasure of Congress. We are further told that the jurisdiction of this District was not assumed until after Congress removed in the year 1801; but gentlemen certainly have not examined the laws by which Congress were invested with the jurisdiction of this District, and I am confident they cannot show any act of Congress assuming the jurisdiction, except the act of Congress in 1790. It appears that after the States of Virginia and Maryland had made provision agreeable to the Constitution for the cession of this District, by an act of Congress passed in the year 1790, a district not exceeding ten miles, to be located as hereafter directed, shall be, and the same is hereby, accepted for the permanent seat of Government of the United States; and, sir, the moment Congress passed that law, their jurisdiction was complete. For, although they did not exercise the jurisdiction, the power was vested in them, and provision was made for the government and regulation of the District by enforcing the laws of Virginia and Maryland until Congress should otherwise provide.

The reasons which the friends of the resolutions have advanced why we ought to recede the jurisdiction, are, that these people in this District have no rights secured to them under the Constitution, and that it is too troublesome and expensive to legislate for them. Let us examine and see whether these are sufficient reasons for Congress to recede the District. Gentlemen have asserted that Congress are the absolute masters over these people, possessing powers more despotic than any of the monarchs of Europe, and in order to relieve them from their degraded situation, which is so repugnant to the principles of our free Government, they wish to restore them to their former state of liberty and independence. If gentlemen had examined the Constitution, they would not have made these assertions; for, to my mind, there cannot be a doubt but there are certain rights and privileges secured to the people in this District, under our Constitution, which Congress have no more power to violate than they have the rights which are secured to the several States.

In the first article and ninth section of the Constitution it is declared that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless the public safety may require it; no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed; and can gentlemen deny that those rights are extended to the people in this District? Certainly not; because the limitation of the powers of Congress is general, and not confined to any particular State or district in the Union. Further, in the articles in addition to and amendment of the Constitution, there are a number of rights secured to these people. Congress can make no law respecting the establishment of religion, or abridge the freedom of speech or of the press. In fact, these people are equally secure in their persons and property, by a fair and impartial trial by jury, under the Judiciary Establishment in this District. But great stress has been laid on the clause giving exclusive legislation to Congress; and I cannot for my part see, that because Congress have a right to exclusive legislation over a district, they can exceed the express limitation of their powers. I think not. And the mighty cry we have heard about the degraded situation of these people is merely ideal; they are secure under our Constitution, and perfectly content with their present situation. And I consider, that, because these people are troublesome, and it costs the United States something to legislate for them, is no reason for us to recede this District; for the same might apply to any other part of the Union. And if this District is such a monstrous evil which exists in our Government, and a nuisance, we ought to get rid of it in a different manner than is now proposed—by amending our Constitution; because it was formed under that instrument. And believing as I do, that our seat of Government is permanently fixed by our Constitution, and although these resolutions do not go immediately to the removal of the seat of Government, they settle the general principle whether the Constitution does bind us or not, I therefore hope they will be rejected.

Mr. STANTON.—Mr. Chairman, I ask the indulgence of the Committee, while I take a view of the resolution on your table, which contemplates a retrocession of all the federal district, except the City of Washington. The advocates for the resolution in vain attempt to prove the constitutionality and expediency of the measure. I shall waive any observations on the ground of constitutionality, and will endeavor to confine myself to the question merely of expediency. Mr. Chairman, I confess I do not perceive the utility of this resolution; but, on the contrary, plainly foresee the serious evils that will inevitably result from its adoption. An honorable gentleman from the State of New York made an attempt to show the propriety of the resolution on your table; he frankly told the Committee he was not only willing to make the recession of Alexandria and Georgetown, but the City of Washington also, and that he had no objection to the removal of the permanent seat of Government. I thank the gentleman for his candor. I have believed, from the moment the resolution was offered to the House, that it meant something more than merely the retrocession—that it was introduced as an opening wedge, for the removal of the seat of Government; although I am free to declare, that I verily believe the mover of the resolutions was actuated by pure motives, and does not wish a removal of the present seat of Government, yet it is very probable that other gentlemen are aiding the measure with that view. The gentleman from Virginia, who I now see in his seat, supported the resolutions with such ingenuity and talents, that he almost persuaded me to become a convert and sign his Koran; though he was unfortunate in having a bad cause, yet he managed it admirably, and merits much praise. The honorable gentleman from Georgia, who spoke early in this debate, took occasion to quote part of an excellent prayer, one of the best in the world. He said "Lead us not into temptation;" I beg leave to repeat the following part of this inimitable prayer, "But deliver us from the evil of adopting this resolution," which is pregnant with many evils. Mr. Chairman, as the subject and patience of the committee is already exhausted, I will not trouble them longer, but conclude by observing that the District of Columbia is a legitimate child of the Constitution; although a refractory and expensive one, yet it is, in my opinion, premature and unwise for a parent to neglect, or refuse to foster his legitimate offspring. At the same time I deplore as much as any gentleman on this floor, the unpleasant situation of the citizens of this district, with regard to their deprivation of the elective franchise. It is one of those evils that grows out of our Constitution, and we must yield to it, as it is a less evil than to make frequent innovations on the Constitution and laws of our country, which never fail to weaken the reins of Government. Mr. Chairman, these are the principal motives that will induce me to give my vote against the resolution.

Mr. STANFORD.—The gentleman behind me, from Rhode Island, does me honor, to be sure. He acquits me of any intention of a removal of the seat of Government. But says, however, he cannot help thinking a little about the beauties of Edenton—the beautiful spots about that town. Mr. S. was at a loss to understand well the application of the gentleman's innuendo. He did not know for his part anything about the beauties of Edenton. He had never been in that town in his life. The allusion, therefore, could have no reference to him. Having disavowed, early in the debate, the least intention of that kind, he thought it might have sufficed, but if it would do, he would again declare as the mover of the resolutions, that to remove the seat of Government would be one of the last votes he would give. As a pledge that such was not his intention he had consented that the city itself should be excepted from the intended cession, and not from any idea that its jurisdiction was necessary or could be retained to the General Government with advantage, for, indeed, he believed the contrary.

Being up, he said he would just observe in answer to the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GODDARD,) who had expressed some surprise at the opinion that the people of this district held no rights but those of courtesy, and, to evince the contrary, had read the third amendment of the Constitution, intended to protect religion, the press, and the right of petition. He would acknowledge he had advanced such an opinion, and still believed he was right. Congress had the exclusive right of legislation over this district in all cases whatever, and consequently could, if they thought proper, pass an alien or sedition law to operate within the district. The eighth section of the first article gave Congress sole and exclusive power in so many words, and these formed an exception to the general system, a kind of political death-warrant to the people of this territory. The amendment read, therefore, can only apply generally to the people of the States, but not to any within these devoted bounds. The saving clauses of the Constitution were intended for others, not for them. They were in his opinion excluded from all the boasted privileges of citizens of the United States.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. LUCAS,) who had been esteemed for ingenuity on most occasions, certainly was not as happy as usual upon the present. He had dwelt much upon the preamble to the Constitution, to show that some rights still remained to the inhabitants of the district, and had read with some emphasis the beginning words, "We, the people." Now these words were certainly the most unhappily selected of any in all the Constitution. No person in the district can read those words with application to himself. They can never read only as the sad "memento" of what these people once were. "We, the people of the United States," are words implying the free agency and sovereign sway which they, the people of the United States, have reserved to themselves in their own Government. Their voice when heard must be obeyed, but what voice have the inhabitants of this district? What were they intended to have? None, in his opinion. And yet we hear much about their rights, a people disfranchised, entirely divested of all agency in their own affairs, have rights! Subjects at the will and pleasure of Congress; and yet rights to claim and assert! He believed they were without any, or the shadow of any. The different speakers upon that occasion had attempted to show rights of an implied or constructive kind; but, for his part, he thought the Constitution would not bear any such construction, at any rate none had been given satisfactory to him; nor indeed could he be persuaded that the framers of that otherwise happy instrument intended that they should have any.

He had nothing more to say than to express his consolation, that a much stronger vote was like to be given in favor of the resolutions on the present, than had been on the former occasion, and that it was his earnest hope and wish that the subject would not be suffered to sleep.

Mr. SMILIE advocated, and Messrs HUGER and CLAIBORNE opposed the resolutions; when the question was taken on agreeing to the first resolution, for receding that part of the District formerly attached to Virginia, and passed in the negative—yeas 42, nays 62.

The question was then taken on the second resolution, for receding that part of the District, excepting the City of Washington, formerly attached to Maryland, and passed in the negative—yeas 42, nays 65.

The Committee then rose, and reported their disagreement to the resolutions.

The House immediately took the report into consideration.

Mr. ALSTON said, he did not rise for the purpose of entering into a lengthy discussion of a subject, which has already occupied so much time; in his opinion much more time had been consumed, than the importance of the subject merited.

Although, in Committee of the whole House, there had appeared to be a considerable majority against the resolutions for receding the District of Columbia, to the States of Virginia and Maryland, yet he had a hope that the House would not concur in the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the first resolution, which only went to the recession of that part of the district which lay on the other side of the Potomac, to the State of Virginia. Most of the reasons which gentlemen had urged against the recession, had been bottomed upon an idea that this measure was only a stepping stone to the removal of the seat of Government from this place altogether.

Those objections could not have any weight, provided that part which formerly was a part of the State of Maryland was retained. He believed some gentlemen had voted against the resolutions, under an impression, that the friends to the recession had it in contemplation to remove the seat of Government. Mr. A. said, he would only answer, for himself, that no such idea had entered his head; he had no desire ever to see it removed from this place, and was he now called upon to give a vote for a permanent seat of the Government of the United States, it would be for this place, in preference of any other; to remove it from this place would be one of the last votes he should think of giving.

He felt at this time indifferent as to the second resolution, which was, to recede to the State of Maryland that part of the district which was taken from that State; he hoped that gentlemen before they decided finally upon this question, would take into view the real situation of the people and the district. The district was composed of a people, who had been heretofore governed by laws passed by two different States; they were separated by the river Potomac; their manners, habits, intercourse, and trade, were very different; their separate interests and wants were as different as those of almost any two States in the Union; that no one uniform system of laws would satisfy them; that so long as they were under the immediate control and government of Congress, strife and discontent would be the inevitable consequence. A great deal had been said about the sentiments of the people of the district, and that they were very much opposed to being receded; whether this was a fact or not, he did not pretend to say, but he verily did believe, if the recession of that part of the district which lay on the other side of the river was made, and the people restored to Virginia, that in a very little time they would become much better satisfied, than they now were.

Mr. BEDINGER.—This question has been so fully discussed, that I have not the vanity to think that I shall be able to change the vote or opinion of a single member of this House. But as it is an important question, and as I believe attempts will be made, and have already been made to mislead the public mind, by pretending to explain the motives of those who are in favor of the resolutions, therefore, to prevent as far as I can a mischief of this kind, I am induced now to come forward briefly to declare my opinion. I deny having any intention to remove the seat of Government from this place, and my vote on former occasions will justify the assertion. I am unwilling to sacrifice the vast sums of money which have been expended here on the public buildings; I am also unwilling to sacrifice private property and national confidence, and all this without obtaining any advantage to the Union. I am, and have uni-formerly been, a friend to this place as the seat of Government, and being so, I will do all I can to support the Constitutional rights of the citizens of the territory; and in voting for the resolution, I hope I am acting in conformity to the declared intention and spirit of the Constitution, which requires us "to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

Much has been said on the constitutionality of this question. The Constitution has on this question been examined with the utmost attention; but I believe not one single sentence has been found, which (without a forced construction) is in opposition to this resolution, but, on the contrary, I think the spirit as well as the letter of the Constitution grants this power. The third section of the fourth article reads thus, "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States;" and if we attempt to secure the blessing of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, I believe this resolution will afford us an opportunity; and although I am certain my vote will be recorded with the minority, I still feel a conscious satisfaction in the propriety of my vote. I will not refuse to the inhabitants of eighty-four square miles out of one hundred, the territory of Columbia, (computing the city at four miles square, or sixteen square miles.) I will not by my act deny them the right of suffrage or representation, so long as I think the spirit of the Constitution and the principles contained in the declaration of rights may be violated thereby. To the many objections which have already been made against continuing this territory in this degraded situation, I will add one more, which is, I think it is a bar to its population; and whether the granter or the refuser of equal rights, is its greatest friend, is a question (I think) not hard to determine by a republican; for my own part I would not wish to live in a territory, to raise a son in it, who should thereby imbibe the servile principles of slavery from his infancy, and I have no doubt but there are many who will on this account remove from it, or, being out, will be willing to stay there. When we consider this place as a permanent seat of Government for the United States, (for the happiest people in the world,) and this House the school of politics, to teach our youth the art of virtuous legislation, and where the true spirit of liberty ought to dwell, shall we here refuse to cherish the principles which made us an independent nation, and doom this place (of all others on the continent) the first to perpetual slavery? I hope not. Would such a condition help to form a more perfect union, establish justice, or insure domestic tranquillity? I think the contrary will be the result, and so far as the experiment has already been made, this truth cannot be doubted; this territory not being secured in any State rights by the pale of any constitution, in the case of a bad administration might become a bone of contention, the seat of usurpation, and an asylum for all those villains who might flee from justice, as they might here meet with protection; as the rights granted to States by the Constitution to demand from States criminals who flee from justice, does not apply to this territory; add to this the power of a disaffected party, and it will be difficult to calculate the extent of the evils which may arise from one, which at first view, to many may appear at present but small. For these and many other reasons, I am opposed to the report of the Committee of the Whole, and in favor of the resolution.

Mr. DENNIS.—The discussion of the principles involved in the resolution has taken a wide and extensive range in the Committee of the Whole, and the subject has generally been considered as exhausted. In the outset of that discussion, in a reply to the author of the resolution, I hastily suggested to the Committee what appeared to me the prominent points involved in the proposition; and without going much into illustration of my own propositions, contented myself with the expectation that they would be enforced by other gentlemen of more ability than myself. In this expectation, I have not been disappointed, and it was therefore that I have sat as a silent and attentive observer of the several speakers, who have done me the honor of noticing my remarks, and have heard some of them perverting arguments which were used and others ascribing to me such as were never expressed, without an intention to reply. But, I have perceived, that as the discussion in Committee embraced at the same time both resolutions, some gentlemen voted then under the idea of voting on the two resolutions together, and are inclined to vote differently in the House on the first resolution from their vote in Committee. I must therefore be pardoned, for reminding them, that every objection on the ground of constitutionality, expediency, and of violation of private right, applies as forcibly to a recession of part, as to the whole, and will claim the indulgence of the House whilst I make some remarks in reply to the observations of some of the speakers, in support of the resolution.

To attempt a reply to them all, and to recapitulate all the leading arguments against the resolutions, would not be admissible at this late hour of the day. I shall confine myself to replying to some prominent observations, and to the statement and illustration of such propositions as result from and go to refute them. In all discussions of this nature, those who hold with the weaker side of the question, choose to misconceive the strong points of their adversaries, or cautiously to avoid them. It is necessary, therefore, that I should distinctly state the primary objections to the resolution, on the Constitutional question; and when this is done, it will be seen, that after all the fine and metaphorical speeches of our opponents, few of them have touched at all the real point in controversy: that they have confounded together, the cession and acceptance of the district, or the object on which the exclusive legislation of Congress is to be exercised, with the power to exercise, at any given time, their exclusive legislation. And because they see that Congress may omit to exercise any given legislative power at any particular period, over a standing object of legislation, have very logically concluded that they may alienate that very object of the legislative power itself. Here let me tell these gentlemen, once for all, that I do not deny the power to repeal the act of assumption, but that this repeal does not, and cannot reannex the territory and its jurisdiction to the States to which it formerly belonged; and that the motion before us is not to repeal the act assuming and exercising the jurisdiction, but proposes to divest us of the territory itself, which is the subject of the exclusive legislation of Congress.

Believing that Congress were limited in the exercise of their powers by the Constitution, not only in relation to the number of the objects, but also in the extent of their power over any given subject, I have called on those who have heretofore expressed their enmity to constructive power, to show me the authority for divesting themselves and their successors of one of the standing objects of the legislative power. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. EPPES,) first up in reply, contented himself in a great degree, with railing at the errors of the Convention—their folly and their wickedness, in inserting into the very heart of our political systems, that cancerous principle, which, unless speedily suppressed, must soon consume the very vitals of national liberty. Having exhausted the stores of his imagination on this subject, he at length thought it necessary to offer some reason and authority for the exercise of so strange a power. Admitting no express power is to be found, he enters into the wide field of construction, and tells us that it is incidental to sovereignty. That, by the definition of the best writers, legislative power and the sovereign power are convertible terms, and that it is one of the incidents of sovereignty to alienate territory. [Here Mr. EPPES rose to explain.] Mr. DENNIS, after hearing the explanation, said, he still understood the gentleman, if he was understood by him at all, as inferring the power from the supposed convertibility of sovereignty and legislative power.

I do not deny that in some countries, the sovereignty and legislative power are the same, and that it is an incident to alienate territory and jurisdiction. But ours is a limited legislative power, and the power which we possess is more restricted than even that of the States. For, as it relates to State authority, all power is delegated except what is prohibited; but the reverse of the proposition is true as relates to the General Government. I do not deny your right to sell territory, but your power to sell a legislative power, a right of exclusive legislation, vested by the Constitution, for a particular purpose, and not contemplated as an object of barter, and of sale, or donation, is what I do deny.

The two gentlemen from Pennsylvania, (Messrs. FINDLEY and SMILIE,) are next in order on the Constitutional question. The former gentleman, whose understanding, stored with the fruits of a long experience in legislative life, I have been taught every day more and more to appreciate, commenced his remarks, by telling us there was no question before us but that of expediency; that the constitutionality of the proposed transfer, was a self-evident proposition. I confess, sir, I should have been better satisfied, and should have thought it more conformable with the habits of that gentleman, to have undertaken to demonstrate a proposition which his friends, at least, thought required some argumentative support, than in assuming, as conceded, the very point in controversy. But, although he considered it an axiom, and too plain to be reasoned upon, in the outset of his remarks, yet we see him afterwards undertaking to illustrate this axiom, and to prove it accordingly, he tells us, like his colleague, that the power results from the power of repeal. But does he not perceive that by the very same arguments that he undertakes to prove that we possess all the power of our predecessors in repealing laws, that our successors will possess the same that we do; and that if we repeal the act of assumption, they may repeal the repealing act and revive the jurisdiction?

But it is considered by many, and it is reasoned from as a conceded point, that Congress may not only elect to exercise their legislative power or not, over the district when acquired, but there is nothing obligatory in the Constitution as to the obtaining of a federal district at all; that if they choose they may forever hold their sessions in a place within the territorial and jurisdictional limits of a State. This is a doctrine which I deny, and of which no proof has yet been afforded in the elaborate argumentation of the friends of the resolutions; unless it was intended that a federal district should be acquired in which the operations of the Federal Government were to be conducted free from the possibility of control by State authority, the whole paragraph is a dead letter; and although I have admitted that when such a district shall have been acquired, you may exercise, or not, the exclusive legislation vested in Congress, yet I do contend that the Constitution is imperative, so far as that such territory shall be acquired, and over which this exclusive legislation shall always potentially exist—in the same manner that a power to make a bankrupt law shall always exist, although you may exercise it or not, at discretion. Surely the non-exercise of a power does not annihilate it, for, if so, we have already annihilated several powers committed to our charge, and may annihilate the whole.

The next gentleman who has favored us with his remarks on the Constitutional question, is a gentleman from Virginia, and whom to distinguish from the numerous speakers from that State, I will call the new member from Virginia, (Mr. CLARK.) This gentleman certainly gave us a very handsome and ingenious speech, and, like a man of analysis, at once saw and seized the question in controversy, laid down his premises, and regularly drew his deductions. Aware of the extent that the principles advocated by his friends would carry them, and that all their doctrines were predicated on the principle that the power not expressly prohibited to Congress was granted, he admitted the correctness of the converse of the proposition, and declared he would not contend for the exercise of the power unless it were expressly delegated. Here he conceded more than was required; for, in my turn, I do admit that we may not only exercise the powers specifically delegated, but such as are clearly necessary to carry them into effect. He then proceeds to declare that the express power of making a retrocession is to be found in the words "exclusive legislation;" that exclusive legislation and omnipotent legislation are synonymous terms; and having the power of exclusive legislation over the District, we may do with it whatever in the plenitude of our own potency we may think proper.

I confess, sir, it would never have occurred to me that the most appropriate language in which to delegate a despotic legislative power, was that of exclusive legislation; nor have I ever annexed any other idea to the use of a term which seems to some gentlemen to contain such magical force; or thought that the exclusive legislation to be exercised by Congress meant anything more than a legislative power to be exercised, exclusive of State authority, under the limitations as in other cases. Truly, according to this gentleman's construction, it ought to have been denominated, excluding legislation, as it goes to vest in us the power of excluding from ourselves and our successors one of the permanent objects of the legislative power.

The plain and manifest meaning of the word is to be found in the nature of our Government, which is an imperium in imperio, which, as it relates to the action of its legislative power, differs from any other nation in the world. The Federal Government acts over the same territory and the same persons which are operated upon by the governments of the States, and they, in many cases, have a concurrent legislative authority. For example, a State may impose a tax on carriages at the same time that Congress have acted upon the same objects; and it is so in an infinite variety of cases. But in the district selected as the seat of Federal authority, it was thought proper that Congress should have the entire control; and this was to be effected by the power of legislating exclusively of State authority. I am sure the good sense of that gentleman, on a little reflection, will satisfy him of the correctness of this interpretation, and that he will admit the necessity of resorting to some other part of the Constitution to find the express delegation of the power in question, without which, he admits, it is not to be exercised.

That gentleman, however, seems to have been aware that he ought not to depend for the support of his doctrine on such equivocal authority as the term alluded to, and, therefore, resorted to the third section of the Constitution as another authority by which the power was expressly vested. It reads as follows: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States,

'or of any particular State." What other meaning can be attached to this clause, but that of vesting in Congress the right of selling their vacant territory, that is, the right of soil therein? So far from contending for this right of legislating over their territory being considered by the Convention as vesting an omnipotent control over it, as is now contended, and so fully were they impressed with the limited nature of the powers vested in Congress by the Constitution, that they deemed it necessary to delegate to Congress an express power to sell their territory and other property. But it is not the property in the soil, or any other property that you are new about to alienate, but a legislative power—a right of jurisdiction; and if this clause vests in you this power, then you may alienate every other power, and transfer your whole legislative authority to some foreign State. This clause, therefore, proves too much, and the gentleman will discover that the power to alienate territory or other property is as inappropriate to the object of selling legislative authority, or of abridging Congressional jurisdiction over an object of their legislative power, as the term, exclusive legislation.

But, it were vain, sir, to examine into the different theories and authorities of my opponents on this subject. They all tell you the power exists. Some say it does not exist but by implication; others that it does exist by express delegation. Those who contend for it by construction, derive it from different sources; those who say it is plainly written in the Constitution, differ as to the clause and section where it is to be found; although they are all equally astonished that no one else can discover it. Some find it expressly given in one place, and some in two. In this manner they prove, themselves, that it no where exists. That it is not expressly given is clear, or else all would see it in the same place—that it is not given by the construction is equally clear; for it will not be contended that it is necessary or incidental to the execution of any other delegated power, since we may carry into effect all powers without resorting to a retrocession of the district. Indeed, sir, it is a strange sort of constructive power, which vests in Congress the right to alienate a part of its legislative authority, to put itself under the entire control of another jurisdiction, which may prevent us from going on with the national business, altogether, and executing our other powers, and to assign as a reason for it, that it is an incidental power, or a power necessary to carry into effect other powers.

Mr. Speaker, the time was, when the assertion of this doctrine of constructive power, was regarded as a usurpation in Congress, which, unless speedily checked, would result in melting down the State sovereignties into one mass of national authority, and end in establishing a limited, if not an absolute monarchy. The time was, when the exercise of a power which appeared by fair and necessary construction to be necessary to carry into effect the powers vested in Congress, was regarded by the then jealous guardians of State and popular rights, as the acts of tyranny and oppression. I allude to the case of the alien and sedition laws. Here the exercise of a constructive power excited the jealous apprehensions of our philosophical politicians, and Congress were equally assailed by the pop-guns of newspaper paragraphists and political pamphleteers, and by the heavy artillery of legislative assemblies. The advocates of these measures admitted there was no express authority given for the exercise of these powers. But, with reference to the alien law, they said, that Congress were invested with the power of the national defence; and if they had no power to expel from their shores the citizens or subjects of a hostile nation, who might from time to time be landed on our territory under the pretext of seeking an asylum in the nation, but intending in this way to insinuate them into the very heart of our country, to be in readiness to join an invading army, it were vain to undertake the execution of the important trust committed to their charge. They therefore claimed, at a dangerous crisis, the right to exercise that power, as incidental and necessary to carry into effect their specified powers. The same power was inferred in the same manner in the passage of the other law, since without the power of suppressing sedition, and the means necessarily leading to it, the Government itself must be subverted. Can any person say there was not better ground for the authority in those cases, if constructive power is at all to be indulged, than in the present instance? And how will the former jealous opponents of constructive power, contend for a doctrine which breaks down all the barriers of the Constitution interposed between the rights of the people and the States on the one hand, and Congressional omnipotence on the other? A principle which establishes the doctrine that the powers not expressly prohibited to Congress, or expressly retained, are granted to them in absolute sovereignty!

But, sir, the paragraph of the Constitution, and the establishment of the District, which is a creature of it, have been distinguished by many and very odious appellations. By a gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. ELMER,) it has been denominated an excrescence of the Constitution. This gentleman is a professional man, and, as the doctrine of excrescences is connected with his profession, ought to be better acquainted with the term than myself. But my idea of an excrescence is that of a fungus or other substance growing out of a previously existing body. It is presumed that this part of the Constitution is coeval and co-existent with every other part of the instrument. If therefore it become an excrescence because this gentleman chooses so to call it; another gentleman may call, and in the same way make, any other obnoxious passage of it an excrescence; and a third and a fourth may do the same, until the whole body of it will be composed of excrescences; and as these political doctors will conclude they have a right to cut away excrescences, the whole Constitution will be cut to pieces by the sharpened knives of our Legislative surgeons.

[Here Mr. ELMER rose to explain, and said he did not say it was an excrescence of the Constitution, but of the body politic.]

To which Mr. DENNIS replied, it did not alter the case, as in the same way he might make the Constitution an excrescence of the body politic.

Other gentlemen have christened the District with various names, and assigned to its political state the appellation of a monster; and this monster has at different times, and in the imagination of the different speakers, assumed multifarious qualities and various forms. It has never yet been seen, nor has it yet devoured a single citizen of the District; but it is supposed to be a hydra, which, with its hundred mouths, will soon commence its destructive career, (though these prophets cannot foretell the precise period when it will begin,) and will first eat up all the men, women, and children, in certain parts of the territory, and then overleap its barriers and devour the nation. But it is a little singular, and a phenomenon not yet to be explained by our naturalists, that this monster lurks only on the Virginia side of the Potomac, and in that part of the territory, within the former limits of Maryland, lying to the north of Rock creek; and that whilst it occasionally crosses and recrosses the river, it should never attempt to come within the magical circle with which our philosophers have environed the City of Washington! And, sir, it is a little wonderful, that amidst all the sympathies of these gentlemen for the good people of Columbia, they have never glanced their benevolent eyes towards the dangers of the city! It now remains for me, sir, to make a few remarks relative to the degraded state in which the imaginations of our political metaphysicians have placed the people of this District.

And first of all let me ask, if they be in that abject and deplorable state of slavery which is supposed to exist, who have been the foolish or wicked agents that have put them there? I presume they have been placed in their present situation by the General Convention, the Legislatures of Maryland and Virginia, and the act of Congress accepting the cession. Of course, the members of these bodies, respectively, must have been either so foolish as not to perceive the effect of their measures, or a very cruel, hardhearted set of men, who, from the mere love of sporting with the rights of their fellow-men, have doomed them to civil and political despotism. There seems to be no alternative between their folly and their wickedness. However, Mr. Speaker, it may be that these bodies, and particularly the General Convention, who were the primary agents in this business, and who have been generally considered by foolish people as equally wise, virtuous, and patriotic, were both fools and despots. As the whole American people and the world have been mistaken upon this point, it is equally probable that the people of the District, their wise men, their professional men, and their judges, who have generally thought that the several provisions of the Constitution restricting the exercise of a despotic power, whether by the Legislative, Executive, or Judiciary departments, applied to this District and other territories, as well as to the people of the States, have all been under a gross mistake; that, though they are in the daily habit of experiencing all the practical benefits of civil and political right, except of actual representation, they are mere slaves. But there is no doubt these mists of error are now dissipated, and that they, and all the world, will now be convinced of their mistakes by the omnipotent logic of the illuminated and illuminating supporters of the resolution.

It has been again and again shown, that all the restrictions on the powers of the several departments, both in the body of the Constitution and the amendments thereto, are equally applicable to the people here as to any other people in the Union. At this late hour I will refer you to the fifth amendment only. It is therein declared, "that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless by a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land and naval forces, or in the militia," &c., "nor shall any person be subject, for the same offence, to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall he in any criminal case be compelled to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." Does this clause apply to the people here, or does it not? If it does not, I cannot see why it does not, and the supporters of the resolution have forgotten to demonstrate that it does not so apply, though no doubt they can easily do so.

Can a people thus guarded be justly obnoxious to the odious appellation of political slaves; and is there any evidence they are so, but the reveries of our sympathetic philosophers? No, sir, the people who feel themselves safe and secure in their rights, and independent in their political opinions, smile at these political quackeries, and know they are to all substantial purposes as well situated as the constituents of those who speak so much about the abstract rights of man. It is true they have no actual representation, but if on that account they are slaves, what will many of them be if restored to Virginia; and what are those citizens of Virginia who, possessing no freehold, are deprived of the right of suffrage? I mention not Virginia here for the purpose of obloquy, but because her right of suffrage is more limited than any other State; because she has been already mentioned by a gentleman of that State, (Mr. JACKSON,) and because, if it be true, that every man who is deprived of a right to participate in the choice of representatives be a political slave, then Virginia will have more of this class of men than any State in the Union. Though the consequence is inevitable, I know the fact will not be admitted by some of the advocates of the resolution. This will prove, sir, that this doctrine of representation and taxation is not susceptible of regulation by the precise rules of arithmetical proportion, and admits of deviations perfectly consistent with the substantial freedom and happiness of a people.

Again, sir, I have been charged with advocating doctrines anti-republican and anti-revolutionary, tending to despotism, and incompatible with the rights of man. Those who make these assertions would have been prudent to have consulted the Declaration of Independence, and re-examined the principles in which originated the Revolution, in order to see how far those principles may be found to comport with or contravene the principles of the resolutions before us; and whether the support of the principles of the resolutions be the best evidence that they are entitled to be regarded as the exclusive champions of those great and essential principles of liberty whereon have been raised the independence and glory of our country. Not having done so, let me do it for them.

One principle of the Revolution was, that of resistance to Parliamentary supremacy, and a claim to apply to us a system of measures and of government contrary to that we had chosen for ourselves, and a right to dispense with certain great and fundamental principles which seemed to belong as well to the colonists as the mother country.

Here the omnipotency of Congress over these people has become a familiar phrase, and claims are set up which seem to regard the people of the territory as the absolute slaves of Congress, who, like the bondmen of ancient Europe, are to be transferred from one master to another as so many appurtenances to the freehold.

Another principle of the Revolution was, that the people have a right to choose their own governors; but these people have chosen Congress for their governors, and these champions of the Revolution say the people here are incapable of judging of their own interest, are unworthy to be consulted, and must be transferred to Maryland and Virginia. It was another grievance complained of by the authors of the Revolution, that the mother country attempted to impair the rights secured by charters and legislative promises at the time of the emigration of our ancestors, and which constituted the leading motives for that emigration.

Here you are about to violate the most solemn engagements, in confidence of which the people of the District have given up whatever rights they may have formerly possessed, which have induced many of them to emigrate from Europe and elsewhere, and here to vest the whole of their pecuniary resources, and to look to Congress for the exercise of that exclusive jurisdiction which they have preferred to the government of the States, to whom the territory formerly belonged, and this, too, in the very teeth of their remonstrances. I might sum up the whole catalogue of grievances which were the foundation of the Revolution, and show that there was not a single violation of our civil or political rights in that instance, which you are not about to sanction in the passage of these resolutions.

I know, sir, some gentlemen have told us that we have no evidence that the people assented to the exercise of Congressional authority, and were not consulted in the original transfer. To this remark it would be a sufficient answer, that in the formation of the Federal Constitution, every individual of the United States consented, that if the particular foot of land on which he resided should be included within the ten miles square, he would submit himself to the exclusive legislation of Congress. But although this is the way in which the sense of a people is usually ascertained, to wit: by the sense of representatives, we need not the aid of such support in the present instance. If these skeptics will look over the files of Congress, they will find petitions signed by almost every person living within the three counties of which this District was originally composed, who was capable of signing a petition, counting that jurisdiction as one of the greatest blessings you could extend to them, with which they are still satisfied, and of which it is now proposed to deprive them.

And why are they to be deprived of the right of choosing for themselves? Because they formerly belonged to Maryland and Virginia, and because by restoring them to their former situation they must be so much more eligibly situated, that they and everybody who resists it must be fools, or regardless of all the rights and blessings of a Republican Government. A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. CLARK) has used a very strong comparison between the government of Congress, and of the States of Maryland and Virginia. According to that gentleman, by restoring the people on the west side of the Potomac who are the objects of the first resolution to the State of Virginia, they are to experience the kind and indulgent protection of a parent, instead of the cold indifference and petulance of Congress—an ill-natured stepdame. Perhaps, sir, this idea might be enlarged upon, and in the estimation of that and other gentlemen we might greatly enhance the happiness of the whole American people by releasing them from the jurisdiction of this peevish, crusty, cold-hearted, ill-natured stepdame, and putting them under the kind, maternal, and fostering patronage of this tender and affectionate parent.

Another gentleman from Virginia (Mr. EPPES) has talked much about the blessings of self-government, and other gentlemen have spoken much of the necessity of destroying that monster, which they call taxation without representation. In the first place it may be answered that the people here are not taxed for local purposes, except in their several corporations where they are represented. But if the people must be restored to self-government, as one of the greatest blessings man can enjoy, let them be blessed with self-government in reality, and not merely in name. If this horrid monster must be slain, let the people of Columbia be gratified in destroying him with their own hands, and in their own way. Let him be stifled by a territorial government. Let the people of the District have the entire management of their concerns, and let them enjoy the benefits of a representation and of a government in which their voice will be heard, their will obeyed, and their interest promoted; where they will have the substance, not merely the apparent and nominal blessings of the representative principle.

All those who think we may not only suffer the legislative power over the territory to be exercised by the States of Maryland and Virginia, but who also think we may transfer forever the very object itself on which the legislative power is to act, must admit the right to delegate the power to a subordinate authority within the District. I believe myself we cannot transfer the District itself and reannex it to Maryland and Virginia, but that we may consent that an inferior legislative power may regulate the internal concerns of the District, but over which we shall always have the power of revision and control, and of which we cannot divest ourselves or our successors. This power has been already practically recognised in delegating to the several corporations within the District, a legislative power to a certain extent, and which is also recognised by the States in the establishment of their respective corporations. Instead of depriving the people here of the blessings of self-government, as some have conjectured, I have always been of opinion, and still retain my first impressions on the subject, that a Territorial Legislature ought to be extended to the people of the District, reserving to Congress the exclusive right of legislating on certain matters connected with the public property, and their own convenience. And always having the power of repealing or annulling any improper act, we shall retain in our hands all the benefits and advantages of exclusive legislation, whilst we avoid the trouble of regulating the local concerns of the District.

I will now conclude my remarks, after having imposed too long, I fear, on the kind indulgence of the House, by observing, that if the sentiment of the poet be correct that "partial ill is universal good," notwithstanding my abhorrence of the resolutions on account of their injurious effects on the people of the District, I am in some degree reconciled to the proposition on account of the information which has been imparted by the supporters of the resolutions in their various theories and commentaries on the abstract and imprescriptible rights of man, tending so much to the edification of the American people and the advancement of Republican Government.

Mr. HOLLAND.—Mr. Speaker: I rise, sir, to exonerate myself from the charges so liberally cast upon me and upon the friends of the resolutions, by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. DENNIS.) That gentleman is not contented to find himself in a majority, but he has indulged himself in reprobating the motives of the minority; he has charged them not only with an attempt to violate the Constitution, but also of having a design in a tyrannical manner to take away the sacred rights of all the people of the United States, as well as the rights of the people of this territory; but the gentleman has failed to demonstrate these charges by showing in what manner the Constitution would be violated or the rights of the people impaired. Notwithstanding the severity of his strictures he has not specified any rights that could in the least be affected, except the value of a small portion of private property that might undergo a temporary depreciation, from an apprehension that the measure was a prelude or stepping stone, as it has been called, to the removal of the Government from this city. But, sir, apprehension of this kind on the enhancement or depreciation of a small portion of private property is of little consideration when it comes in collision with the public convenience—it being a political axiom that private emolument or expectations of pecuniary interest must give place to public good; and I also admit that all the argument in favor of a partial cession would apply with equal force to a cession of the whole, and was it not for the apprehensions that a cession of the whole would excite, I should prefer it; and so soon as the people are convinced that a removal is not the object, I should cheerfully cede the whole territory. For the present it will be sufficient to cede all without the city. But I am of an opinion that the measure will have but little effect upon the private property of this place; so soon as it is known that a removal is not intended, all private property will regain its intrinsic worth. But, I would ask, what bearing can the making municipal regulations for the people within the ten miles square have upon the removal of the Government from this place? To my mind the continuance here will be prolonged by the measure proposed. So long as you continue to legislate for these people you will be placed in a disagreeable situation; to legislate for a people whose interests and localities you are unacquainted with, and to whom you are not responsible, is to me an unpleasant task, and has a tendency to sour the minds of the members; and as it will be attended with considerable expense, and prolong your sessions, it ultimately will produce a general disgust unfavorable to this city. The measure proposed is to relieve all future Congresses from a difficulty—the continuance of which will increase the evil, without any possible good under the sun. Let it be remembered that the transfer of the jurisdiction does not transfer any of the valuable and realised property that the Government has secured at this place. It will continue to be the property of the Union. It is not the power that we have of making laws for this territory that will be any inducement to the continuance of the seat of Government here. Its permanency rests upon other principles. This is a central position, suited to the convenience of a large majority of the people, and the Government having acquired much valuable property and comfortable accommodations here is the cause of our sitting here. But so soon as this is changed—when the period arrives that it will be more for the interest and convenience of a large majority of the good people of the United States—they will remove, and they ought to remove, to a place better suited to their convenience. Nor do I consider that there is anything in the Constitution that will prevent the removal at any time when the general sentiment shall dictate the measure, which, in my opinion, will not be in a short period; not until the population of the new acquired territories very much changes the state of things. But has the gentleman demonstrated in what manner the rights of the people of the United States are involved in this question? He has said it, and has left us to conjecture in what way a recession can affect their rights. And for myself, I cannot conceive of what consequence it is to the people of the Union whether the people of Columbia enact their own laws or whether they are made in conjunction with the States of Maryland and Virginia, or made by the Congress of the United States; they can be affected in no other way than in a pecuniary point of view; and a recession would exempt them from this. In every other respect the municipal regulations of the people of this district to the people of the United States is a thing of no consideration. It might afford an agreeable sensation to see them governed as freemen, enjoying the rights of other citizens.

I am not a little surprised at an opinion given by a gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. LUCAS.) That gentleman seems to think that the people of this territory at present enjoy as much freedom as the citizens of Virginia, and was he to choose his residence, he would make choice of this territory, as being the place of the most political freedom. I think if the gentleman would reflect, he would find himself incorrect. When we consider a people in their collective or national capacity, individual, political disfranchisement is not to be noticed—then, in a national point of view, what is the comparison? Virginia has the sole power to make and execute her own laws, either by the citizens collectively or in their representative capacity. She forms every regulation necessary to their State government, and she has long been in the possession of a right, and has exercised it, of being ably represented in both Houses of the Congress of the United States. Let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if these are not highly important political rights—rights peculiar to a free government—such rights as are not enjoyed by the people of Columbia? I admit, with the gentleman, that these people have civil rights. They are secured in their persons and property; they can sue and be sued. So can aliens; but these people, like them, have no political rights. They may be said to be politically dead, and to return them to the States from whence they were taken, would restore them to the rights of citizens; yet it is said to be an act of tyranny to revert them with those rights that have been, and I hope ever will be, considered as sacred to freemen. The gentleman from Maryland has said that, by the Constitution, Congress is commanded to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over this district, and that this injunction is extended to all succeeding Congresses; but in reading the Constitution, I am unable to discover any such command. By the Constitution, Congress is invested with exclusive legislative power over this District, and over any other portions of territory that may be ceded by any of the States for the purpose of arsenals,

H. OF R.

&c.; but this investment of power, like many other powers that are given by the Constitution, is not obliged to be exercised. The exercise of these powers must be a matter of sound discretion, and ought to be exercised only when the public good requires it. Does the gentleman see to what extent this doctrine goes? After Congress has exercised a jurisdiction, if they are unable to decline that jurisdiction, but must continue to exercise it over all the cessions that may be made by the States, the consequence will be that by a strange kind of inability in the General Government she will become a monster, and eventually swallow up all the State jurisdictions. The extent to which this principle goes demonstrates its absurdity. The Constitution has vested Congress with exclusive legislation over this territory; or in other words, with sovereign legislative jurisdiction; (exclusive and sovereign, as it applies to the powers of Congress relative to this territory, meaning the same thing,) it follows that Congress has sovereign legislative power over the people of this territory. This being the case, the power of Congress is unlimited; bound by no law but their own will. The will of the sovereign is the law of the sovereign. Congress, therefore, has nothing more to do on this occasion, than to consult its own will, and in doing this Congress should exercise a sound discretion; and if upon mature deliberation it shall be found inconvenient for them to continue the exercise of this power, they may say at what time, and in what manner, and to whom they will transfer it. There is nothing that has given importance to this question but the mere circumstance of this territory being the seat of Government. Divest it from this, and consider it in the abstract, and it will be found that the Constitution does not limit the transfer of their power over any other territory over which they have exercised a jurisdiction. Indeed, the gentleman from Maryland gave up the ground of contest. That gentleman admitted that Congress had a Constitutional right to give to the people of this District a territorial government. That is, that Congress could rightfully cede to the people of this district a part of their legislative powers. This being admitted, does it not then follow that they may cede the whole of their legislative powers to the people of this District? and if they can to the people of this District, cannot they also cede it to the people of this District as being connected with the States of Maryland and Virginia? This to my mind would be the most natural kind of cession. For what purpose would you cede to the people of this District the powers of a territorial government? Would such a government be consistent with the general interest, or give satisfaction to the people of the territory? So far as we have experienced the operation of territorial governments they have been unfavorable, and they have been obnoxious to the people. The people of those governments soon become hostile to their rulers, and press forward to obtain the rights of freemen. It is not in the nature of man to be contented with half freedom. If you give them a territorial government they will be discontented with it, and you cannot take from them the privilege you have given. You must progress. You cannot disfranchise them. The next step will be a request to be admitted as a member of the Union, and, if you pursue the practice relative to territories, you must, so soon as their numbers will authorize it, admit them into the Union. Is it proper or politic to foster an arrangement that will lead to this? Is it politic to add to the influence of the people of the seat of Government by giving a representation in this House, and a representation in the Senate equal to the greatest State in the Union? In my conception it would be unjust and impolitic, and to avoid this and other evils, I shall vote against the report of the Committee of the Whole, and in favor of the original resolutions.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on agreeing to that part of the report which involved a disagreement to the first resolution, and carried affirmatively—yeas 87, nays 46, as follows:

Only twenty-one members rising in favor of this motion, it was lost.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on agreeing to the report of the committee, involving a disagreement to the second resolution, and carried affirmatively—yeas 69, nays 39, as follows.

So the said motion was rejected.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the whole report of the committee, and carried—yeas 50, nays 28.

FRIDAY, January 11.

Mr. LEIB, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to amend the charter of Georgetown; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Postmaster General, of the seventh instant, to whom was referred the memorial of Robert Henderson, of the State of South Carolina; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act for imposing more specific duties on the importation of certain articles; and, also, for levying and collecting light money on foreign ships or vessels, and for other purposes;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. WINSTON, a member of this House for the State of North Carolina, informed the House of the death of his colleague, Colonel JAMES GILLESPIE, late one of the members of the said State in this House: Whereupon,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of JAMES GILLESPIE, late a Representative from North Carolina, and that this House will attend the same.

Ordered, That Mr. ALEXANDER, Mr. WINSTON, Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. WYNNS, Mr. DICKSON, and Mr. WINN, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of this House will testify their respect for the memory of the said JAMES GILLESPIE, by wearing crape on the left arm for one month.

DRAWBACK OF DUTIES.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the memorial of Thomas Ketland, of the city of Philadelphia, merchant, made the following report:

The petitioner, with John Ketland and James Williamson, all of Philadelphia, in June, 1799, purchased the ship Washington, in London. It is stated that the ship arrived in the Delaware on the 4th of May, 1800, entered at the custom-house, in Philadelphia, on the 17th of said month, and cleared out for Batavia, on the 9th of July following, at which time she received a sea letter, and other regular documents.

The Washington is a foreign built ship, and, by existing laws, is not entitled to the benefit of an American register.

It appears that merchandise, on which the drawback was payable, was exported in the ship to Batavia, (the quantity not stated,) which, having been previously imported in the same ship, had been charged with the additional ten per cent. on the duties.

The collector retained this part of the drawback, under the direction of the act of the 13th of May, 1800, and which the petitioner is now solicitous should be refunded to him.

The Committee on Commerce and Manufactures reported on this case at the last session of Congress, but the petitioner being of opinion that the committee have misconstrued the material facts upon which their decision was founded, solicits a revision, for reasons mentioned in his petition.

On the 13th of May, 1800, Congress passed an act, in which it declared that no part of the additional duties, payable on goods imported in foreign ships, should be drawn back on exportation. And, on the 14th of April, 1802, another law was passed, declaring that the act above referred to should not be deemed to operate upon unregistered ships or vessels, owned by citizens of the United States at the time of passing the said act, in those cases where such ship or vessel, at that time, possessed a sea letter, or other regular document, issued from a custom-house of the United States, proving such ship or vessel to be American property.

At the last session, from the documents then exhibited, the committee concluded the ship sailed for Batavia without a sea letter, but they did not rest their decision on that point. It was material only to prove that the Washington, on the 13th of May, 1800, did not possess a sea letter, or any regular documents, issued from a custom-house of the United States, proving her to be American property. It is stated in that report, that the act of 1802 did not mean "to extend its remedial operation, or to retrospect beyond the 13th of May, 1800; and the petitioner's case not coming within the limitation and description therein specified, there did not seem to be even an equitable claim on the Government for the drawback of the additional duties," &c.

A certificate from the Collector of Philadelphia states that the ship cleared out for Batavia on the 9th of July, 1800, and took out a sea letter and the usual documents; so that it is fully proved she does not come within the provisions of the act of April, 1802; for that act was only meant to operate in favor of vessels possessing a sea letter, &c., on the 13th of May, 1800.

By looking at a document furnished the committee, it appears the petitioner places some dependence on the circumstance, that the ship's "manifest" was delivered to a revenue officer, on the 9th of May, but he acknowledges that the entry at the custom-house was not made until the 17th of May. A manifest is not a regular document issued from the custom-house; it is a memorandum or inventory of the inward cargo, to whom consigned, &c., and is generally made out at sea, and is presented to any revenue officer who demands it, and a copy is always necessary to be delivered previous to the entry.

This paper furnishes no evidence whatever that the owners of the ship Washington ought to receive the allowance prayed for. Upon an impartial review of the whole case, therefore, the committee are satisfied—

1st. That the ship Washington, on the 13th of May, 1800, did not possess a sea letter, or any regular document issued from a custom-house of the United States, proving her to be American property.

2d. That, under existing laws, although the ship received a sea letter, &c., on the 9th of July, 1800, and may now possess it, no goods or merchandise imported in that ship, after the date of the act of May, 1800, can be entitled to the allowance of the additional duties, as drawback upon their exportation, either in the same bottom or on any other whatever. And, further, the committee are fully convinced that unregistered vessels of the United States ought to receive the same privileges, in our ports, as those built within the United States, and entitled by the laws to the benefit of American registers; and the ship Washington's case clearly not being within the limits or provisions of the act of April, 1802.

The committee submit their opinion, that the prayer of the petition of Thomas Ketland ought not to be granted.

Referred to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

SATURDAY, January 12.

Resolved, That the Speaker address a letter to the Executive of the State of North Carolina, communicating information of the death of JAMES GILLESPIE, late a member of this House, in order that measures may be taken to supply any vacancy occasioned thereby in the Representation from that State.

MONDAY, January 14.

The bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act for imposing more specific duties on the importation of certain articles, and also for levying and collecting light money on foreign ships or vessels, and for other purposes,'" was read twice, and committed to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Postmaster General, of the seventh instant, on the memorial of Robert Henderson, of the State of South Carolina; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be authorized to grant such additional sum, not exceeding four thousand two hundred dollars per annum, to the contractor or contractors for carrying the mail in a line of stages between the town of Fayette, in the State of North Carolina, and the city of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, as he may deem expedient and necessary.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. HUGER, Mr. CLAIBORNE, and Mr. CUTTS, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making an appropriation for completing the south wing of the Capitol, at the City of Washington, and for other purposes. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill further to amend an act, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to prohibit the exaction of bail upon certain suits brought in the District of Columbia; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with several amendments thereto, which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution, to wit:

Resolved, That the following be adopted as one of the rules of the House, during the remainder of the present session:

"It shall be the duty of the Speaker to call on the chairmen of all the standing and select committees, at the hour of twelve of the clock, on the Friday of every week during the session; or, if the chairman is absent, on the member of the committee present, next in numerical order, to inform the House of the progress made by the respective committees on the subjects referred to them."

And the said resolution being twice read at the Clerk's table, was, on the question put thereupon, disagreed to by the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims, of the eighth instant, to whom was referred, on the twenty-third of November last, the memorial of Alexander Murray, late commander of the United States frigate Constellation; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. RHEA moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a statement of the number of the officers and privates in the actual service of the United States during the years one thousand eight hundred and three, and one thousand eight hundred and four; and, also, all the names of the posts where soldiers are stationed, together with the number of privates and officers at such posts; and, also, a detailed statement of the sums expended during the years one thousand eight hundred and three, and one thousand eight hundred and four, on fortifications, arsenals, and magazines.

The House proceeded to take the motion into consideration; when, an adjournment being called for, it was postponed until to-morrow.

TUESDAY, January 15.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a statement respecting the "moneys which, since the establishment of the present Government, have been paid as fees to assistant counsel, and for legal advice in the business of the United States," in addition to the statements furnished by him on the twenty-fourth of March last, pursuant to a resolution of this House of the third of the same month; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill making an appropriation for completing the south wing of the Capitol at the City of Washington, and for other purposes, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill further to amend the act, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee," was read the third time and passed.

Mr. HUGER, from the committee appointed yesterday, presented a bill authorizing the Postmaster General to make a further allowance for carrying the mail from Fayette, in North Carolina, to Charleston, South Carolina; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The motion of Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, calling on the Secretary of War for the list of officers and soldiers in the service, and the names of forts, &c., where they are stationed, being the unfinished business of yesterday, was, at his own request, postponed till Monday next.

On motion, it was Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and if any, what amendments are necessary to the several acts regulating the grants of lands to the refugees from Nova Scotia and Canada, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. THOMAS, Mr. THATCHER, and Mr. THOMAS MOORE, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill to prohibit the exaction of bail upon certain suits within the District of Columbia was brought in engrossed, and read the third time.

The final passage of the bill was opposed by Mr. GODDARD, Mr. ROOT, and Mr. NELSON, and defended by Mr. NEWTON, as a proper measure to prevent the oppression of malignant creditors.

Mr. EPES desired Mr. BECKLEY to read that part of the Constitution of the United States relative to the extent of the Judiciary power, and that part of the law establishing the Judicial authority of the District of Columbia, with a view of showing that the bill was not essentially necessary.

Mr. EARLY moved a recommitment of the bill to a select committee.

Mr. BEDINGER wished that the bill might go to a select committee, because he considered the principle a valuable one. He imagined, however, that the details were not altogether perfect. He felt concerned on this subject, on account of several of his constituents who had been tricked out of notes and bonds for lands in Kentucky, which had been advertised, and were no longer available against the drawers in that State; but, should it so happen that business called them to Washington, they might be extremely harassed for want of bail.

The reference was opposed by Mr. R. GRISWOLD, as he was against the principle of the bill altogether.

On the question to recommit it, it passed in the negative—ayes 44, noes 59.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and it was lost, there being but thirty members who voted in its favor.

WEDNESDAY, January 16.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying his report on the petition of sundry officers of the Army, stationed at the city of New Orleans, referred to him by an order of the House of the fourteenth instant; which were read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. VARNUM, Mr. G. GRISWOLD, Mr. M. CLAY, and Mr. HUNT, to consider and report thereon to the House.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing his report on the petition of Fontaine Maury, of the city and State of New York, referred to him by an order of the House of the fourteenth instant; which were read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion of Mr. LEIB, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to amend the Charter of Georgetown. After going through the same, and making several verbal alterations, the Committee rose and reported the bill with amendments, which were agreed to by the House.

Mr. VARNUM moved to give the Mayor of Georgetown a qualified veto upon the laws passed by the Aldermen and Common Council.

On the question to agree to the same, the House divided, and there appeared thirty-nine in its favor, and forty against it.

The SPEAKER declared that it was not agreed to.

Mr. SMILIE said he had risen in favor of the motion, but he believed he had not been counted, as the Speaker had passed his seat before he rose.

The question was hereupon put a second time, and there were forty-four in favor of the amendment, and forty-two against it. So the amendment was agreed to.

The next question was, on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading. The House divided, and there were for the motion fifty-seven, against it thirteen. This not being a quorum, the members were called upon to divide a second time, and, there appearing sixty-three in favor of ordering the bill to be engrossed, it was carried in the affirmative.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand eight hundred and five.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH moved to fill the blank, in the clause providing for the expense of intercourse with the Barbary Powers, with $63,500, instead of the sum of $113,000, stated in the estimate for the current year. The difference ($50,000) would make a part of additional appropriations, for which he should move a distinct clause.—Motion carried.

Mr. R. then moved to add the following words "for the contingent expenses of intercourse with the Barbary Powers — dollars." He said, that he should be obliged to ask $150,000, in addition to the sum reserved out of the preceding appropriation, and of course to fill the blank with the words $200,000. This was rendered necessary because the Mediterranean fund, heretofore liable to this charge, had been subjected, on the motion of a gentleman from Connecticut, to the whole expense of the support of the Navy. He supposed that no difference of opinion could exist on the subject of enabling the Executive to make peace with Tripoli. He had no objection to any restriction which might be thought necessary to limit the application of the additional sum of $150,000, which he required, to the object for which it was intended. But as the words ransom, or tribute, had never been introduced into our statutes, heretofore, he hoped they would not be admitted on this occasion.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD had no objection to making the appropriation required, or even a larger sum; for he was well convinced that the President ought to have funds as well as authority to accomplish any object connected with the present subject, which he might wish to accomplish.

The motion he had made for the appropriation of the Mediterranean fund, to the Naval Establishment, he had conceived to be a proper course of proceeding, and his motion for that purpose had the honor of being seconded by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. J. RANDOLPH.)

Mr. J. RANDOLPH declared the gentleman to be mistaken.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD did not charge his memory perhaps with precision, as to his having actually seconded the motion, but he would venture to assert that the gentleman had said upon the suggestion that the motion would be a proper one, that if he (Mr. R. G.) would make the motion, he (Mr. J. R.) would second it. He admitted that the appropriations, heretofore made, but not expended, were now locked up and confined to the one object which had been mentioned.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said that nothing was more disagreeable to him, and it cost him nothing to believe that it was equally so to the gentlemen from Connecticut, than to enter into anything like verbal altercation; but the observations which the committee had just heard, required some notice from him. The gentleman is so far correct, when he states that I agreed to second the motion if he would make it, and I can assure him, that, however reluctant, I should have been as good as my word, if I had not been anticipated by the adroitness of his friends, whose alacrity and promptitude in seconding the motion of that gentleman it is not easy to emulate and impossible to excel. It will be recollected that when the act laying the duties, the proceeds of which were to constitute "the Mediterranean fund," was under consideration, it was opposed by the gentleman from Connecticut on the ground that it was a subterfuge to raise money to cover a pre-existing deficit of revenue: that the loss of the Philadelphia was a mere pretext for raising supplies to defray the ordinary expense of the Navy, which, otherwise, we had not funds to defray—and that whilst the avowed object of the bill was to provide for an extraordinary armament, for a vigorous exertion, which our recent loss demanded, it was in reality a mere fetch to throw the whole weight of the Naval Establishment on this fund. Provision was then offered to be made that the ordinary expense of the Navy, estimated at $650,000, should continue to be defrayed out of the ordinary revenue, and that the application of the "Mediterranean fund" to the objects for which it was avowedly raised should be inviolably secured. It was accordingly provided, in the appropriation bill for the current year, that of the $1,240,000 voted for the naval service, not more than $590,000 should be charged on the Mediterranean fund, leaving the ordinary expense still chargeable on the ordinary revenue. When, therefore, I offered to second the motion, if that gentleman would make it, to strike out the proviso, it was done under the same ideal security as if we had been on the house-top, and I had offered, if he would jump down first, to jump down after him. I did the gentleman the injustice to believe that he had too great a respect for his own consistency to bring forward a motion to effect the very object, the design to bring about which he charged upon us at the last session as highly reprehensible. For this act of injustice to his character I sincerely ask his pardon. Hereafter I shall be better informed, and there is no danger that the offence will be repeated. The gentleman's motion prevailed and the whole expense of the Navy was thrown on the Mediterranean fund. The appropriation now asked was for an object, for which that fund was intended to provide. The words of the act of last session (after providing for the armament) are, "and for the purpose also of defraying any other expenses incidental to the intercourse with the Barbary Powers, a duty of two and a half per cent. &c. shall be laid." This fund having been diverted to another purpose, the appropriation now required must be charged on the ordinary revenue. To the public it was a matter of little consequence out of which it should be paid.

Naval Appropriations.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD finding himself charged with inconsistency, in having moved to appropriate a fund raised at the last session to the very object he had then said it was raised to meet, did not wonder at such a charge being made, from the reports of the debates, because he had frequently been made to appear in the newspapers as inconsistent, but he hoped he should now be heard and clearly understood. He had said, at the last session, that the two and an half per cent. additional impost was raised to cover the expense of the Navy: and, this session, he had moved that it might be fairly appropriated to that object. Now where is the inconsistency attributed to him? He said then, that under the pretext of a temporary Mediterranean fund, Congress were laying a tax to cover its permanent expenditure. Congress did so, and the money has been raised, and what has now been done? Why, truly, he had moved and the House had agreed to appropriate it without disguise to the object he had foretold it was to cover. In all this he was at a loss to discover his inconsistency.

He did not see what difference it could make on the present occasion out of what fund the money came; whether the temporary two and a half per cent. or the general fund. In either case the money would be equally good, as there is no difference in the value of the coin supplied by either.

He always thought it a better way to go direct, and in a plain path, to his object, without masking or manœuvring, or covering bills with plausible titles. He would last year have declared plainly that the money was wanting in the Treasury, and not have given their tax bill any captivating title. But, to conclude, he expressed his willingness to give the $150,000 for the object required, or more. He hoped that Congress would grant enough for every purpose connected with the present war, so that our ships may not again be so long in fitting out; but that they may reach the point of destination before the season has elapsed for naval operations.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH congratulated the gentleman from Connecticut, and all who had been conversant with him in public life, on the reform which he had just announced in his political character. That day was to form a new era in the life of that gentleman. Hereafter he was to exhibit himself as a plain, artless man, undisguised in his views, who would frankly disclose his object, and march up to it in a direct line. But, indeed, it seems he has always had a bias towards this open and manly mode of proceeding. The gentleman has always had an abhorrence against bills with specious titles, tending, as far as a mere title could do it, to deceive the public as to the real object in view. It would be a matter of amusement if the Clerk should be called upon to read some of those bills, passed under the gentleman's auspices, whose specious titles and specious defenders were unable to blind the public eye as to their real object—"An act in addition to an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States"—in homely phrase, called the sedition act—and some others.

The gentleman declares his readiness to vote money in sufficient quantity to prevent the delay in our future equipments, of which he complains in a recent instance. It, indeed, was one of which the nation might also complain; but which neither money nor diligence in the Navy Department could remedy. It arose out of a circumstance with which the present Administration had nothing to do. It was the necessary effect of placing the capital of the United States in a desert, and the principal navy yard of the Union in a wilderness. The consequence was, that the workmen, the materials, the ships' stores, in short, the supplies of every kind, were to be brought from a distance, (sometimes in carriages,) at an immense expense of time and money. With some of the fairest cities in the world, and with more good ports than all Europe perhaps could boast, the United States had chosen for their metropolis and naval arsenal, such a spot as Peter the Great had been driven to fix upon by necessity—a morass at the head of a long and tedious navigation, where ships are liable to be frozen up for two or three months in the year. With this additional disadvantage, however, that a vessel of any considerable draught of water cannot proceed to sea without the delay of being attended by lighters to carry her guns, which she must take in below. What was the situation of the ships now in the Eastern Branch? Suppose them ready for sea, and that circumstances required a small squadron to be despatched only to protect the entrance of the Chesapeake. They must wait for a thaw. The evils, therefore, of which the gentleman complains are, in some sort, of his own creation. They cannot be remedied until Washington shall become a great commercial city, and the rigors of the climate shall be softened by the benevolence of nature.

Mr. DENNIS did not think it necessary to connect the City of Washington, as the capital of the United States, with the navy yard on the Eastern Branch. The one might be the most fit for its purpose of any which human wisdom could point out, while the other might be liable to some objections which had been urged against it; and he did not deny but there were other places equally as commodious for all the purposes of equipping vessels of war. But he considered the arrangement of the navy yard at this place a measure of sound policy.

The question was taken on filling up the blank, without a division, and carried in the affirmative.

THURSDAY, January 17.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter, together with a memorial and sundry accompanying documents, in the Spanish language; from Don Joseph de Cabrera, attached to the Legation of Spain, near the United States, now confined in the debtor's apartment of the jail in the city of Philadelphia, under a warrant from the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania, charging him with sundry criminal offences; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said that the Committee of Ways and Means had received a letter from the Secretary last evening, by which it appeared to be necessary to add an additional item to the appropriation bill, and to make a small alteration in an item already agreed to. The letter was read by the Clerk, and then, on motion, of Mr. J. R., the bill was recommitted to a Committee of the Whole.

After some time spent in considering the same, and making the requisite amendments, the Committee rose and reported. Thereupon, the House proceeded to consider the motion, and having concurred in the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

PAYMENT OF CERTAIN DEBTS.

Mr. CLAIBORNE moved the order of the day for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making further provision for the extinguishment of the debts still due from the United States. This bill goes generally to make provision for the payment of certain debts liquidated at the Treasury. A new section was proposed by Mr. C., making similar provision for all unliquidated debts due for services rendered or supplies furnished during our Revolutionary war. A debate of considerable length and interest grew out of the question for adding it to the bill.

On motion the Committee divided, and seventy-eight members voting in favor of inserting it in the bill, it was carried.

A motion for striking out the last section, limiting the duration of the bill to — years, was made by Mr. MACON.

Another debate of some length took place, and when the Committee divided, there were forty-eight in favor of striking out, and fifty-eight against it. So it was determined in the negative.

Mr. ELMER proposed a new section embracing the cases of Messrs. Bowen, Moore, and Elmer, officers of artillery, but who were not attached to the line of any State, providing for an allowance of the depreciation of their pay, which they did not obtain under the resolution of the old Congress, in consequence of having resigned a few days previous to its taking effect.

The motion did not succeed, only eighteen members voting in its favor.

Mr. THOMAS proposed a new section, enacting that the claim of the United States against individual States, for balances which occurred previous to the year 1790, should continue to exist till the — day of —, and no longer.

This motion was also lost, only twenty rising in its favor.

The last section, limiting the duration of the law for — years, being under consideration, it was proposed to fill up the blank with "two," "three," and "twenty."

The question was taken on the highest number, viz: "twenty," and lost, only twenty-seven members voting in its favor.

On filling the blank with "three years," the House divided, and fifty-one were in the affirmative, and forty-two in the negative. So it was carried.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill and its amendments, and the House proceeded to consider the same.

A considerable debate took place on concurring in the amendment proposed by Mr. CLAIBORNE, extending the law to unliquidated claims; and upon the question of concurring, the House divided, and fifty-four were for it, and fifty-six against it. So the amendment was not agreed to.

Several verbal amendments were afterwards agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time on Friday next.

FRIDAY, January 18.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and five; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The Chairman of the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business made a further report, that the law regulating the manner of taking evidence in case of contested elections had expired, and ought to be revived; also that the law for incorporating the inhabitants of the City of Washington would expire with the end of the present session, and that it ought to be renewed. The report was referred to a Committee of the Whole for Monday.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was committed, on the fourteenth instant, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act for imposing more specific duties on the importation of certain articles; and, also, for levying and collecting light money on foreign ships or vessels, and for other purposes,'" reported that the committee had directed him to report the same to the House, without amendment: Whereupon,

Ordered, That the said bill and report be committed to a Committee of the Whole this day.

An engrossed bill making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year one thousand eight hundred and five, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill to amend the charter of Georgetown was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill making farther provision for extinguishing the debts due from the United States was read the third time: Whereupon, the farther consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the city of New York, in the State of New York; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to establish the districts of Genesee, of Buffalo creek, and of Miami; and to alter the port of entry in the district of Erie; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Charlotte Hazen, widow and relict of the late Brigadier General Moses Hazen," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The Senate's amendment was taken up and considered. It went to allow her a pension for life, from the first day of January, 1805, of two hundred dollars per annum.

Mr. VAN CORTLANDT moved to amend the amendment by striking out the first of January, 1805, and inserting in its stead the fourth of February, 1803, being the day of her husband's decease.

This motion being carried in the affirmative, the bill was returned to the Senate. Shortly after which another message was received from that body, expressing their agreement to the amendment proposed to the House.

A petition of John York, of Brookfield, in the county of Chenango, and State of New York, late collector of the taxes on lands, slaves, and dwelling-houses, for the eighty-third collection district, within the said State, and now confined in the jail of said county, was presented to the House and read, praying relief in the case of a judgment awarded against the petitioner and execution issued thereon, for the sum of eight hundred dollars, including interest and cost of suit, for the payment of which the petitioner was compelled to apply a certain proportion of the proceeds of taxes collected by him in the capacity aforesaid.—Referred to Messrs. ROOT, GREGG, and HASTINGS; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. DANA, from the Committee of Claims, made a report upon the application and representation of sundry citizens of Massachusetts, purchasers under the Georgia Company; of the agents of persons composing the New England

Land Company, purchasers under the Georgia and Mississippi Companies, and the agent for sundry citizens of South Carolina, purchasers under the Upper Mississippi Company; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed with the accompanying documents.

The SPEAKER made the usual inquiry, "for what day shall it be made the order?"

Mr. DANA moved Monday, observing that he had no idea of the report being printed by that time, or even if it were, he should not call it up; his intention being merely to have it on the minutes as a notice to the parties interested.

Mr. LEIB moved its being made the order of the day for the third of March next.

The third of March being the most distant day, was first put, and a division of the House was called upon the question. There appeared but thirty members in the affirmative; of course it was not carried.

Monday next was then agreed to, without a division.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved the order of the day on the report of the Committee of Claims, on the petition of Alexander Murray, praying to be reimbursed the value, damage, and costs of a certain vessel captured by him, and which had been decided against him by the Supreme Court of the United States; which being agreed to, Mr. TENNEY was called to the Chair.

The Committee, after some time spent in considering the report of the Committee of Claims, adopted the resolution thereof, that the prayer of the petitioner was just, and ought to be granted, sixty-six members voting in favor of the resolution.

The House having concurred in the report of the Committee of the Whole, it was referred to the Committee of Claims, to bring in a bill conformably to the said resolution.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. DAWSON, from the committee appointed on the petition of Marcella Stanton, and others, reported a bill, entitled an act to authorize the court of the District of Columbia to decree divorces in certain cases; which was read twice, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

Mr. DAWSON prefaced his motion, on this subject, when he introduced it, in the manner following:

He observed that, after the decision which had taken place a few days ago, he had resolved not to meddle any further with the affairs of the District of Columbia, but to leave the inhabitants in the enjoyment of the blessings of that government which they seem to have chosen, and the principles of which were sanctioned by this House.

There was, however, one class of persons who claimed, in all situations, our particular attention; who had not made a surrender of their political rights; and, if they had been defrauded out of their natural ones, were anxious to regain them.

It would be remembered that, at the last session, a gentleman from Maryland, who had been absent for some time, and whom he rejoiced now to see in his place, (Mr. NICHOLSON,) presented a petition from a person in this District, praying for a divorce, and he two others for the same relief. These were referred to a select committee, and a bill reported, which remained among the unfinished business; as he learned that the situations and wishes of these unfortunate persons were still the same, he thought the subject ought again to be renewed.

Mr. SLOAN moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That, from and after the fourth of July, 1805, all blacks and people of color, that shall be born within the District of Columbia, or whose mother shall be the property of any person residing within said District, shall be free, the males at the age of —, and the females at the age of —.

The House proceeded to consider the said motion, and on the question that the same be referred to a Committee of the whole House, it passed in the negative—yeas 47, nays 65, as follows:

So the said motion was rejected.

MONDAY, January 21.

A memorial of the people called Quakers, at their yearly meeting, held in the city of Philadelphia, in the month of December last, was presented to the House and read, praying that effectual measures may be adopted by Congress to prevent the introduction of slavery into any of the Territories of the United States.—Referred to the committee appointed on the twelfth of November last, on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates "to an amelioration of the form of government of the Territory of Louisiana."

Mr. DANA, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Alexander Murray; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The bill for extinguishing certain debts due by the United States, being on its third reading, was, on motion of Mr. EPPES, recommitted to a Committee of the Whole.

The House divided on the motion—50 in the affirmative, and 34 in the negative. So it was carried.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved to make it the order of the day for the fourth of March next.

The House divided—39 for it, and 46 against it. It was then made the order of the day for to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill authorizing the Postmaster General to allow an additional sum of $4,200 for carrying the mail from Fayetteville to Charleston, South Carolina.

The Committee, after some time spent in considering the same, rose and reported the bill with an amendment, which was adopted by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and five; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which were twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act for imposing more specific duties on the importation of certain articles, and, also, for levying and collecting light money on foreign ships or vessels, and for other purposes,'" and, after progress, the Committee rose and had leave to sit again.

DUTIES ON REFINED SUGAR.

MR. CROWNSHIELD, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the memorial of Moses Rogers, Edmund Seaman, and others, sugar refiners in the city of New York, having had the same under consideration, submitted the following report:

The memorialists are extensively concerned in the manufacture of refined sugar, in the city of New York, and are possessed of establishments adequate (as they state) not only to the supply of the home market, but also to the production of considerable quantities for exportation to foreign countries.

They acknowledge they are protected by the present high duties on imported loaf sugar, to the extent of the domestic demand, but, as their refineries are capable of producing still greater supplies, they pray that a drawback or bounty may be allowed on the exportation, to foreign countries, of all refined sugar in the United States, equivalent to the duty paid on the raw sugar employed in the manufacture.

The committee beg leave to inform the House that similar applications have been frequently made to Congress, and it is almost unnecessary to add that the allowance prayed for has been invariably refused. At the last session of Congress, a lengthy, and, the committee thought, a conclusive report, was made on a resolution of the House "to inquire and report, by bill or otherwise, whether a drawback of duties ought not to be allowed on sugar refined in the United States, and exported to foreign ports and places;" and the committee then offered their opinion, "that it would be improper, under existing laws and regulations, to allow a drawback upon the exportation of domestic refined sugar;" and this report was concurred in by the House. Notwithstanding the repeated decisions of Congress, the present memorialists have hazarded their application; but the committee cannot see that they have offered any new or weighty reasons to induce them to alter their former opinions on this subject.

If the committee are not mistaken, it will be found, upon examination, that the sugar refiners are the most favored body of manufacturers in the United States. Our commercial regulations seem opposed to all prohibitory duties, and to monopolies. These are in direct hostility to systems heretofore deemed valuable, are contrary to what is right and just between one citizen and another, and ought never to be indulged in a free country, except (which could seldom happen) where they are necessary for the safety and protection of the whole people. And where monopolies are granted, or where such high duties exist as enable a particular class of men to engross any article of general use in a community, they only tend to heap up wealth in the hands of a few individuals, at the certain expense of the many. The duties on foreign refined sugar have been several times augmented to benefit the American refiners, and since January, 1795, this sugar has been charged with the high duty of nine cents per pound. It is denied the drawback on exportation, and cannot be imported in less quantities than six hundred pounds, nor in vessels of a less burden than one hundred and twenty tons. The committee are at a loss to conceive the necessity of these severe restrictions. Sugar candy pays a duty, on importation, of eleven cents and one half the pound, and there can be no doubt that this extravagant duty was imposed with a view of favoring the sugar refiners. These high duties amount to almost a prohibition of the two articles; for, it is proved that they have been imported only in the most inconsiderable quantities, in late years, so that the sugar refiners possess the whole American market to themselves. They enjoy a certain monopoly in their business. No foreign loaf sugar can enter into competition with what they manufacture. Bengal and China sugar candy could be imported in considerable quantities, at very reasonable prices; and there is no better substitute for refined sugar, either in the lumps, or when reduced to powder; but the present duty on that article excludes it altogether from the American market, to the injury of the East India trade—a loss of revenue to the United States, and to the benefit of no other persons but the sugar refiners. It might be supposed that these high protecting and prohibitory duties on the foreign article secured to the sugar refiners every important advantage which they could reasonably hope to receive. With the exclusive home trade, supplying the United States, upon their own confession, with every pound of refined sugar consumed in the country, charging their own prices to the consumer, the foreign article excluded from our market, the wide range of speculation all their own, their profits great, and probably beyond any other manufacturer's in the United States, it was rather a matter of surprise to the committee, that the sugar refiners should expect further indulgencies.

Without mentioning all the reasons that have occurred to the committee, against granting the allowance in question, they will suggest some of the objections to which it is liable.

1st. The Louisiana sugar might be used in the manufacture, almost in spite of any regulation that could be safely introduced, (and at New Orleans it would be exclusively employed,) and as it is not charged with any duty, the United States would, in many instances, be compelled to pay the allowance where they had received no equivalent.

2d. It is well known that drawbacks are not payable on any goods and merchandise, after the expiration of twelve months, dating from the time of importation, and then only in cases where the original duties have been first received. If the crude sugar should lose the drawback, as it would in one year from the period of its importation, the price would be lowered in the market (presuming it was intended for exportation) in a sum equal to the duties, and it must then be sold for home consumption, probably at a reduced rate.

Now, sugar thus circumstanced, if purchased and manufactured by the refiners, could not be entitled to the allowance of drawback, on any principle whatever; and when it is supposed that the surplus of raw sugar in our market will find its way to Europe, in American bottoms, and when it is considered that, in a refined state, it is not a bulky article, it may be doubted whether its reduction of weight would, in cases of exportation, be so advantageous to the carrying trade of the United States as might at first be imagined. If the sugar is exported in its crude state, the freight would be double, and those merchant ships that depended solely on freight would thereby derive at least a trifling advantage.

Although the committee do not wish it to be inferred that they would recommend the exportation of the raw materials found in our markets, in preference to those manufactured by American workmen, and reduced to half their ordinary bulk, merely for the benefit of the extra freight, yet, in respect to the article referred to, it becomes questionable whether the exporting merchant and ship owner do not now enjoy as great, or even greater advantages, than they would if bounties were allowed on refined sugar, to the extent of the quantity which could be manufactured for exportation from the United States.

3d. As the raw sugar, in refining, undergoes a complete transformation, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to guard against some impositions in paying the bounty, and frauds might be attempted on the revenue. The custom-house officers could not always attend at the sugar houses; and, however upright the intentions of the refiners and exporters might be, the certificates must be multiplied, and such precautionary measures be introduced, as would embarrass the fair collection of the public revenue; and the allowance might perhaps tend, in some respects, to lessen its amount, and certainly it could not augment it.

4th. Should the prayer of the petition be granted, no good reason could be offered why New England rum, distilled from imported molasses, or cordage and cables manufactured from foreign hemp, and canvass made into sails, for the use of vessels, should not receive similar allowances. All the manufactured iron, too, which had paid a duty on importation in its unwrought state, would certainly be equally entitled to the benefit of such allowance; and domestic rum, sail cloth made up for ship's use, cordage, and various articles of iron-work, such as anchors, bolts, spikes, nails, and hoops, are exported from the United States in considerable quantities, and it is believed in value far beyond the whole amount of refined sugar which could possibly be disposed of to advantage in foreign markets, and yet the committee do not recollect that the distillers, ropemakers, sailmakers, or blacksmiths, have ever petitioned Congress for a repayment of the duties on the exportation of the articles employed by them, or connected with their respective occupations.

The memorialists allege that, in Great Britain, a bounty on the exportation of refined sugar is allowed, of forty shillings sterling per hundred weight. In Great Britain the duties on imports will average about thirty per cent. higher than those paid in the United States, and on sugar, in particular, the duty is twenty-six shillings and six pence sterling per hundred weight, exceeding five and one quarter cents a pound, or double the American duty; still, the drawback on refined sugar exported from England is by no means payable at a certain or fixed standard, and a table of English drawbacks, now before the committee, fully prove that different rates of drawback are allowed, varying from forty shillings, when the price does not exceed forty shillings, to thirteen shillings, when the price is from sixty-eight to seventy shillings, per hundred weight; and whenever the average price of sugar exceeds seventy shillings per hundred weight, nothing is allowed, and it is presumed that sugar is often at that price in England, exclusive of the duties. But, in the examination of this question, it is of little consequence what commercial regulations exist in other countries, so long as they do not affect our rights, and it is sufficient for us that we adopt such as are known to be beneficial, and most conducive to the interests of this nation; and individuals ought not to complain that other countries follow this or that system, under different circumstances, and that our laws are not shaped to operate for their exclusive advantage.

Protecting duties on such articles as we can conveniently manufacture have been a long time established in the United States; and surely the sugar refiners can have no complaints to offer on that point; for there, the committee trust, it has been proved they possess peculiar, if not exclusive advantages. Various other objections could be adduced, to prove that Congress ought not to grant the allowance on the exportation of sugar refined in the United States, particularly while the present high duties are continued on loaf sugar, imported from Europe, and sugar candy, from the East Indies and China; but it is supposed to be quite unnecessary to enlarge a report already too much extended. The committee therefore respectfully submit the following resolution:

Resolved, As the opinion of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, that it is inexpedient to grant any allowance or bounty on refined sugar exported from the United States.

The report was referred to the Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

TUESDAY, January 22.

the actual service of the United States, during the years one thousand eight hundred and three, and one thousand eight hundred and four; and, also, the names of the posts where soldiers are stationed, together with the number of privates and officers at such posts; and, also, a detailed statement of the sums expended, during the years one thousand eight hundred and three, and one thousand eight hundred and four, on fortifications, arsenals, armories, and magazines." Whereupon, the said motion being again read, was agreed to by the House.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to this House, copies of any documents in his office, which relate to the case of William Scott, and James and John Pettigrew, stated to have been murdered and plundered by the Cherokee Indians.

The report was referred to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented, by leave of the House, a bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act to promote the progress of useful arts and to repeal the act heretofore made for that purpose;" which was read and committed to the Committee of the whole House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee, appointed, on the fourteenth of November last, to "inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, for the completion of the public buildings belonging to the United States, near Philadelphia;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House as follows:

Resolved, That the sum of eighteen thousand nine hundred dollars be appropriated for the completion of the arsenal belonging to the United States on the river Schuylkill.

Ordered, That a bill, or bills, be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. LEIB, Mr. MOTT, and Mr. CUTLER, do prepare and bring in the same.

A memorial of the Delegates appointed by various sections of the District of Columbia, signed by Cornelius Coningham, their President, and attested by Nicholas King, their Secretary, was presented to the House and read, submitting to the consideration of Congress sundry propositions, by way of amendment and modification of the acts relating to the government of the District of Columbia, which they pray may be adopted for the convenience and benefit of the memorialists and other inhabitants of the said District.—Referred to Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. PLATER, Mr. LEWIS, and Mr. LUCAS; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of the widow and orphan children of Robert Elliot. The bill was reported with an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

OLIVER EVANS.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred, on the twenty-first ultimo, the petition of Oliver Evans, of the city of Philadelphia, made a report thereon, as follows:

The petitioner has invented many useful improvements on merchant flour mills, for which he obtained a patent, dated January 7th, 1791. This patent expired on the 7th of the present month. He states that he has also made several valuable discoveries, and improvements on steam engines—explanations, and drawings of which have been exhibited to the committee. The petitioner represents, that, owing to the great extent of the United States, and the difficulties usually attending the introduction of improvements in new countries, he has not yet been able to collect any considerable sums from his patent, and having found it necessary to impose on himself a condition, not to expend in new inventions and discoveries any more than the net profits derived from old ones, he finds himself compelled to ask for the extension of his patent right, for the improvement in merchant flour mills, with a view that he may appropriate the proceeds towards completing his further inventions on steam engines, which in his opinion, are, in their operation, from five to ten times more powerful than any others heretofore invented, in proportion to size and weight; and he avers that he has conceived still greater improvements on steam engines, (which he has not yet put in practice) to lessen their expense, and cause them to last longer, increase their power, and diminish the consumption of fuel to about one fourth part.

The petitioner appears to possess a mind capable of conceiving, and a strong propensity for making new discoveries and inventions, and the greater part of his life seems to have been devoted to improvements in labor-saving machines, and if he could be encouraged to persevere, it is highly probable his discoveries may be rendered useful to his country, and at the same time profitable, and honorable to himself.

He is desirous that his patent may be extended for the term of seven years, without injuring those who have already purchased the right of using it; and if this privilege could be granted, he is convinced that it would enable him to complete his other valuable discoveries, which otherwise he apprehends, from the great expense attending them, he may be obliged to abandon, or at least to delay their completion for several years.

The committee have been favorably impressed with the representations made to them by the petitioner, and would venture to recommend that his patent right for the improvement on merchant flour mills, be extended seven years, from the 7th instant. At the same time, the committee are aware (should the petitioner obtain the extension of his patent) that numerous applications will be made to Congress, by other patentees, for the same indulgence, and as the authors of books, maps, and charts, are allowed to renew their patents for the further term of fourteen years, and seeing no objection to a general provision calculated to meet the reasonable requests of persons who have made very valuable or important discoveries—they ask leave to report a bill on the subject.

Referred to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

DUTIES ON FOREIGN BOOKS.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the memorial of the Philadelphia Typographical Society, made the following report:

The petitioners are desirous that Congress should impose greater duties on books imported into the United States. They are under apprehension that, after the conclusion of the present war in Europe, the English bookseller will be able to undersell the American in his own market; and, possessing a sincere conviction that their situation may be greatly ameliorated by restricting the constant and great importation of foreign books, they solicit an augmentation of the present rate of duties on all books imported into the United States, probably with a view of increasing their profits, or, at least, of giving to the American booksellers the preference in their own market, and to which, the petitioners are of opinion, they are justly entitled.

The committee can entertain no doubt that the petitioners are extremely desirous of encouraging the manufacture of books in the United States; and, if the exclusive interest of printers and booksellers were alone to be consulted, it is probable the committee might be induced to recommend the proposed augmentation in the duties; but, it will be recollected that Congress are legislating for the benefit of the whole American People, and not for the sole advantage of any particular individuals.

At the last session of Congress, a law passed, declaring that rags of all sorts, for making paper, should be imported free of duty. The American paper is presumed to be cheaper here, than it can be imported from Great Britain, and, it may be supposed, we shall soon be able to supply the greater part of the demand for the domestic consumption of that article; so that foreign supplies will not be wanted, after a few years; and, although higher wages may be given for journeymen printers and bookbinders, it must be confessed that the art of printing has progressed more rapidly in the United States, than almost any other branch of machinery. This is a truth acknowledged by the petitioners, and assented to, with much pleasure, by the committee; where, then, can be the danger that the English bookseller will be able to undersell the American in his own market? When it is considered that foreign books pay a duty of fifteen per cent. upon their importation, and that, to this charge, the commissions and various shipping expenses at the place of exportation must be added, together with the freight and insurance, the whole amounting, at the lowest calculation, to forty per cent. in favor of, and as a direct encouragement to, the American printers and booksellers, it might be supposed that the petitioners were sufficiently protected, and that they need not be under any apprehension of foreign competition in their business.

The great expenses which must necessarily attend the importation of European books into this country, if there was no other difference in their favor, will, it is hoped, give a decided advantage to the American bookseller.

In the imposition of duties on imported books, or on any article whatever, it was never imagined that the mere importer became ultimately charged with the amount, or that the Government had not in view the collection of a revenue to defray the expenses, and complete the payments of engagements, for which the public faith stands pledged; but surely it could not be supposed that these duties were to be augmented, at any time, to so high a rate as to amount to a complete prohibition on the importation. If a revenue is to be collected, extravagantly high duties ought not to be laid; and, in their augmentation beyond a fair proportion, a diminution of the revenue may be expected. If the duties are raised to answer the design of the petitioners in its full extent, the consequence will be, that little or no revenue will be derived from imported books; the petitioners will be exclusively benefitted; they will charge their own prices for American books; there can be no competition, and the nation will be the only sufferers.

The American people have still a great predilection for English printed books, notwithstanding it has been frequently proved that they can be as accurately and as elegantly printed here, as in any part of the world. The Committee see no reason why the price should be increased by additional duties, and they are unwilling to augment the charge to those readers, who prefer foreign publications to our own, especially when it is conceived that books of every description, whether of foreign or domestic manufacture, are, at present, sold at the most extravagant prices in the bookstores throughout the United States.

If the committee entertained an opinion that the art of printing was not sufficiently protected in this country, they would consider themselves bound, immediately, to recommend the adoption of some measure, calculated to meet the wishes of the petitioners, for the reasons stated; and, from the strongest conviction that the proposed augmentation of the duties on books imported into the United States is unnecessary and inexpedient, at this time, they submit their opinion to the House—

That the Board of Directors of the Philadelphia Typographical Society have leave to withdraw their petition. The report was agreed to.

WEDNESDAY, January 23.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS,

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to lay before this House a list of the names of persons who have invented any new or useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any improvement thereon, and to whom patents have issued for the same from that office, with the dates and general objects of such patents.

An engrossed bill for the relief of the widow and orphan children of Robert Elliot was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HUGER,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to transmit to this House a statement of the foreign tonnage which has been entered at the different custom-houses of the United States for the years one thousand eight hundred and one, one thousand eight hundred and two, one thousand eight hundred and three, and one thousand eight hundred and four; and as correct a statement as in his power of the tonnage of the unregistered ships or vessels which have been owned by citizens of the United States during the said years, and which were in possession of a sea-letter, or other regular document, from a custom-house of the United States; and, likewise, a statement of the amount of light-money which has been collected on unregistered ships and vessels, and on other foreign ships and vessels, since the passage of the act for levying and collecting light-money on foreign ships and vessels.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, during the year one thousand eight hundred and five," with an amendment, to which they desire the concurrence of this House; also, the bill entitled "An act making an appropriation for completing the south wing of the Capitol, at the City of Washington, and for other purposes," with an amendment, to which they desire the concurrence of this House; and, also, the bill entitled "An act for carrying into more complete effect the tenth article of the Treaty of Friendship, Limits, and Navigation, with Spain," with several amendments, to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, during the year one thousand eight hundred and five;" whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendment.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Captain Alexander Murray. After some time spent in considering and debating the same, the Committee rose and reported the bill without any amendment; it was then ordered by the House that the bill be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD moved a resolution that the Secretary of War be directed to lay before the House a report of the situation of the public buildings on the bank of the Schuylkill, near Philadelphia; what would be the probable expense of completing them; and whether, in his opinion, the public interest will not be promoted thereby.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLSON, the latter part, respecting the opinion of the Secretary, was stricken out.

Mr. VARNUM then moved to add, "and a statement of the quantity of the public stores deposited in the same building." This motion was lost—38 being in its favor and 42 against it.

Mr. GREGG thought such an amendment as the last suggested was necessary; he therefore varied the language, and offered a motion in this shape: "and a statement of the military stores deposited in said buildings." That amendment being agreed to, the question was taken on the original motion as amended, and carried—61 voting in its favor.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation for completing the south wing of the Capitol, at the City of Washington, and for other purposes;" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendment.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for carrying into more complete effect the tenth article of the Treaty of Friendship, Limits, and Navigation, with Spain: Whereupon, the amendments, together with the bill, were committed to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

PROTECTION OF SEAMEN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, accompanying statements and abstracts relative "to the number of American seamen who have been impressed or detained on board of the ships of war of any foreign nation; with the names of the persons impressed; the name of the ship or vessel by which they were impressed; the nation to which she belonged, and the time of the impressment; as also certain facts and circumstances relating to the same;" prepared in obedience to a resolution of this House of the thirty-first ultimo.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD said, that the list of impressed seamen, furnished by the Secretary of State, exceeded in number anything he had expected. He thought these impressments ought to be prevented, and that the subject demanded investigation. He had drafted a resolution, which he would submit to the House, having in view to connect this with another very important subject. Many gentlemen must have observed that some late proclamations had been issued by the Governors of the several British West India Islands, interdicting the American trade after May next. The proclamations bore date in October or November, and were to take effect in six months. It appeared to him that the British Government were determined to exclude us from their islands, upon the expectation that their own vessels would be competent to carry the necessary supplies. Mr. C. said we had a right to carry the productions of the United States in American bottoms, and he hoped we should never permit foreign ships to come to our ports and carry on an exclusive trade with any country whatever, where our vessels were not allowed the same privilege. His intention was to prevent the American carrying trade to the West Indies from falling into the hands of other nations. He would not exclude foreign vessels from our ports, but it was desirable that our own export trade should not be monopolized by foreigners. The subject was highly important to this country. Will the United States tamely submit to see some of its best citizens torn from their families and friends, without attempting something for their relief? Shall we see another country pursuing measures hostile to our commercial rights and make no effort to correct the mischief? The West India Islands depended on the United States for their ordinary supplies, and our vessels had usually carried a large proportion of their cargoes on American account; but it appeared now that we were to be shut out from this trade, and it was in future to be carried on in foreign vessels. An effectual remedy would be to prohibit the exportation of our productions in foreign bottoms to all ports of islands with which we were not permitted to have intercourse, and in order that the subject might undergo the examination which its importance demanded, he offered the following resolution :

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire if any, and what, further provision be necessary for the protection of the commerce and seamen of the United States, and to inquire whether any foreign country has made any late regulations with a view to monopolize any branch of the American carrying trade, to the exclusive benefit of such foreign country, or which in their operation may be injurious to the agricultural or commercial interest of the United States; and also to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting the exportation from the United States of all goods, and merchandise whatever in foreign ships bound to any port with which the vessels of the United States are not allowed communication, or where a free and unrestricted trade is not permitted in the productions of the United States, and that the committee be authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. RANDOLPH wished the resolution to lie for consideration a few days; he would mention Monday. The gentleman had said it was an important subject, and if he had no objection it would be as well to allow the resolution to remain unacted upon for a little time. It might be printed for the consideration of the House, and he rather supposed some alteration would be necessary in the form of the resolution.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD replied that he was perfectly willing the resolution should lie for consideration, agreeably to the desire of the gentleman from Virginia, and he would consent to any reasonable delay; but he would not consent to its remaining unacted upon till a period so late as to preclude any measures from being adopted this session, because the proclamation would take effect in the month of May. He was not tenacious of forms, it was the substance of things he looked to, and he would with great pleasure agree to modify the resolution to any shape which the gentleman from Virginia might suggest.

A motion was made to refer the resolution to a Committee of the Whole for Monday next; which was agreed to, and the resolution ordered to be printed.

THURSDAY, January 24.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, enclosing sundry documents relating to the case of William Scott, and James and John Pettigrew, stated to have been murdered and plundered by the Cherokee Indians, in pursuance of a resolution of this House of the twenty-second instant; which were read and referred to the Committee of the Whole, to whom is committed the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Alexander Scott, of the State of South Carolina, in behalf of himself and others.

On motion of Mr. McCREERY,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of farther continuing in force an act, entitled "An act declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the State of Maryland, passed the twenty-eighth day of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, for the appointment of a health officer;" and that the committee be authorized to report by bill, or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. McCREERY, Mr. LOWNDES, and Mr. NEWTON, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. CLARK moved the following resolution :

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House a circumstantial report of the claims standing upon the Treasury books against the United States, which are barred by the statutes of limitation; by what authority and by whom the settlements were made, and the person or persons to whom the respective sums are due; with any discriminating circumstances that may exist in the different classes of claims.

The House proceeded to consider the said motion; Whereupon the farther consideration thereof was postponed until Tuesday next.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved for the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the bill for preserving peace in the ports and harbors of the United States, and in the waters under their jurisdiction. The House agreed to the same.

Mr. NICHOLSON introduced two amendments; one to supply the place of the second section of the bill, and the other as a substitute for the fifth section. These clauses being lengthy and important, he wished them to be printed before they were discussed; for which reason he wished the Committee to rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD had also prepared an amendment in the place of the second section, which he also wished to have printed. It was accordingly received, and the Committee having risen and reported, the amendments were all ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the city of New York.

Mr. EARLY proposed a new section, providing for the cases of those who suffered losses by the hurricane of the 8th of September last, at Savannah, in Georgia; Charleston, Georgetown, and Beaufort, South Carolina.

The Committee having agreed thereto, rose and reported the same, and the bill and amendment were postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. PURVIANCE laid on the table a resolution for referring to the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, the consideration of the constitutionality and expediency of granting to the inhabitants of the District of Columbia a Legislature chosen by themselves, with instructions, in case they deem it Constitutional and expedient, to report a system to the next Congress.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Captain Alexander Murray was read a third time; and on the question, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. CONRAD said he could not agree to a measure of the kind. The conduct of Captain Murray had been decided illegal in every court in the United States into which it had been carried. He did not approve of a legislative body re-examining decisions of courts of justice, as they were totally unqualified for the object. He therefore could not be content to give a silent vote; for which reason he called the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were taken on the passage of the bill, and were—yeas 66, nays 37, as follows:

NAVY YARDS, &c.

Mr. EUSTIS moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide by law for defraying the expense incident to fitting and preparing one of the navy yards belonging to the United States, and lying near the margin of the ocean, for the reception and repairing of such ships of war as are now at sea on their return to port, and such other ships or vessels of war as may hereafter return from their cruises or stations."

Mr. EUSTIS said the resolution now submitted to the consideration of the House had grown out of an opinion which impressed itself on his mind, when he first beheld the whole naval force of the United States moored in the Eastern branch of the Potomac. He had ever considered the establishment of a navy yard in this city, as the principal naval arsenal, to be among the errors or misfortunes which had presided over many other arrangements respecting this city and territory. As the United States were at that time at peace with all the world, excepting the Dey of Algiers, as a small part of the force only was necessary to carry on this warfare, and as the ships had been actually hauled up at a considerable expense, there appeared to be no immediate necessity for incurring a further expense in their removal. Our maritime concerns have now experienced a change. We are at war with another of the Barbary Powers, and a greater number of ships have been necessarily taken into the service. We have at this time six frigates, and five or six smaller vessels on duty in the Mediterranean. After a certain time these ships must be relieved. Others must be sent out to take their stations. Those which return will require repairs; and in order to prepare for these contingencies it was proper that some one of the navy yards nearer to the ocean should be put in a condition to receive them. This was the object of the resolution. It was desirable that some place should be selected easy of access; where the water was deep, and in the neighborhood of some large maritime town, having large markets and magazines of the variety of articles required for repairing and fitting ships for sea, with the artisans employed in that business. It was not his intention to describe the advantages or disadvantages of one place or of another. The United States own six navy yards. The whole coast is before the Executive, and such a place will be selected as will combine the greatest number of advantages and best promote the public interests. To those who believed that ships of war could be repaired or fitted out with the same despatch, at the same expense, and with the same ease and convenience, at a place three hundred miles distant from the sea, as they could be in one of the ports laying on its margin, and possessing the advantages which had been stated, no reasoning could be applied which would change their opinions. The proposition was offered to the House to be decided by common sense and understanding. There was one objection, which he had anticipated, and which had some weight in it. The business of the department would in that case be removed from the eye of the Government, and from the more immediate inspection and control of the intelligent and capable officer who directed its operations; this inconvenience would be balanced by the more ample means and resources which his agents would find in the large towns, and by which they would be enabled to carry his instructions more promptly into effect. The motion was referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

FRIDAY, January 25.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting the report of the Director of the Mint. The said Message was read, and, together with the report, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LEIB, from the committee appointed on the twenty-second instant, presented a bill making an appropriation for the completion of the arsenal belonging to the United States on the river Schuylkill; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

On motion of Mr. CROWNINSHIELD,
Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary to be made in the several acts fixing the salaries and emoluments of the collectors of duties on imports and tonnage; and that the committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That Mr. NELSON be excused from serving as one of the Managers appointed on the fifth ultimo, on the part of this House, to conduct the impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage,' with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act concerning the mode of surveying the public lands of the United States;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act concerning the mode of surveying the public lands of the United States," was read twice, and committed to Mr. GREGG, Mr. MORROW, Mr. DENNIS, Mr. ALEXANDER, and Mr. MOTT, to consider and report thereon to the House.

A petition of sundry purchasers of lands of the United States, in the State of Ohio, was presented to the House and read, praying, for the reasons therein specified, that an extension of the time of payment for the said lands may be granted by law; and, also, a remission of interest on the several instalments due on the same.—Referred.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage:'" Whereupon, the amendment, together with the bill, was committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

Mr. MORROW presented two petitions, one from Thomas Orr, the other from Joseph Walker, praying Congress to allow them certain sections of land they had settled upon and improved.—Referred to the committee on the subject of the public lands, appointed on the 7th inst.

Mr. McCREERY, from the Committee appointed for the purpose, reported a bill declaring the assent of Congress to the act of Maryland of December 28, 1793, allowing a health officer at Baltimore.

The bill being twice read, on motion of Mr. LEIB, it was referred to a Committee of the Whole for Monday next.

Mr. ROOR, from the committee appointed for the purpose, reported a bill authorizing the discharge of John York from his imprisonment.—The same was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole for Monday next.

The order of the day for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, was taken up.

The first resolution, for reviving and making permanent the law for regulating the mode of taking testimony in cases of contested elections was agreed to.

The second resolution, for renewing the charter of Washington City, being under consideration, Mr. LEIB observed, that it would be unnecessary to act on this subject at this time, as the law of last session had extended the duration of the charter to fifteen years.

On the question, the Committee disagreed to the last resolution.

The Committee then rose and reported.

The House immediately considered and concurred in the report of the Committee of the Whole; and the first resolution was referred to the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, to report a bill for the purpose.

Mr. LATTIMORE presented a memorial from the Legislative Council and the House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory, stating sundry grievances to which they were exposed by the act of Congress for the government of the same. They complain that a man is not qualified to vote unless he possess fifty acres of land, whereby those who hold houses and town lots, as well as respectable citizens of considerable personal estate, are disfranchised. The inequality of representation in the several counties to the number of inhabitants in each; the necessity of extending the powers and authorities of an additional judge lately furnished the Territory; the inconveniences arising from the prescribed mode of the disposal of lands; the necessity of establishing a hospital at the Natchez; and, lastly, an increase of the salaries of the judges.

On motion, the memorial was referred to a select committee of five members.

Mr. R. GRISWOLD, after stating at some length the provision made by the several laws of the United States respecting the duties on the importation of goods, wares, and merchandise, into the United States, and endeavoring to show that saltpetre had been particularly exempted from the payment of duties, under most of them, but that lately the Comptroller of the Treasury had directed the like duties to be taken upon their importation as upon other ad valorem goods—said he regretted that a difference existed on this point; his own opinion, as well as that of several eminent civilians, being the reverse, he moved that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire whether saltpetre is at this time liable by law to a duty on the importation thereof into the United States? If liable to a duty, what is the rate thereof, and whether it is not expedient to define by law the duty to be levied hereafter on that article?

After some conversation on the subject, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD called for the order of the day, on the bill for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire in New York. The motion being agreed to, the House took into consideration the amendment proposed by Mr. EARLY, and agreed to in Committee of the Whole, for extending the like relief to those who suffered by the storm of the 8th of September last, in the ports of Savannah, Beaufort, Charleston, and Georgetown, in Georgia and South Carolina.

The motion being expressly to strike out Georgia and South Carolina, for the purpose of particularizing the ports intended to be relieved, viz: Savannah, Beaufort, Charleston, and Georgetown, a division of the question was called for, and the question being put on striking out, it was carried in the affirmative. The remainder of the motion, viz: Shall the above-mentioned ports be inserted? passed in the negative; so there stood a blank in the bill without connexion. It was then suggested that it would be proper to extend this relief all along the coast where sufferers had taken place. But this being opposed as too extensive, and likely to defeat the bill altogether,

On motion of Mr. EARLY the amendment was referred to a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of restoring it to the state it was in before it was thus mangled. The motion of reference was carried for Monday next.

POST ROADS.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL called for the order of the day on the resolution authorizing the establishment of a post road from Knoxville, in Tennessee, to the settlements on the Tombigbee river, and so on to New Orleans.

On the question, Will the House resolve itself into a Committee accordingly? it passed in the negative.

Mr. STANFORD moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole, with a view of referring the subject to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. NEWTON wished the subject to remain in its present state, until the information which the House had requested of the President was received.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL thought the subject not a proper one for the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and gentlemen might recollect that such a motion had been made when the business was first introduced, and it then failed of success; he hoped the like fate would attend the present motion. It would be recollected that the information alluded to by his friend from Virginia, had been requested seven weeks since, and he presumed was not yet to be procured, nor perhaps might it be during the session; he hoped, however, the House would agree to proceed to the examination of the subject.

Mr. GREGG thought it would be as well to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the bill directing the application of a certain sum of money out of the proceeds of the sale of western lands, for opening certain roads.

Mr. STANFORD observed, the subjects were not similar, as there was a material difference between the useful roads through a country for carrying its produce to market, and a main post road, like the one under contemplation.

The question, on the motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole, was lost without a division.

GEORGIA CLAIMS.

Mr. DANA called for the order of the day on the report of the Committee of Claims, respecting the Yazoo claims to lands. He did this, that, at the time of adjournment, it might be considered as the unfinished business, and might have the preference over every other order of Monday. It would be recollected that the report was made last week, and fixed as the order of the day for Monday last, but he had forborne to call it up till this time, in order that gentlemen, after having had the printed report so long in their hands, might be prepared to meet the discussion, if not the decision.

Mr. NEWTON was about observing that the subject was too important to be taken up in a thin House, and, if gentlemen looked round, they would perceive most of the seats vacant.

He was here reminded by the Speaker that no debate could take place on the priority of business. If gentlemen were not prepared to go into Committee of the Whole, they would vote against the present motion.

Mr. NEWTON said, since that was the case, he would move to adjourn.

The motion to adjourn being decided in the negative,

The SPEAKER put the question on going into Committee of the Whole on the report.

On a division, there were 47 in the affirmative, and 43 in the negative; the motion was of course carried.

The CHAIRMAN proceeded to read the report, and when he had gone through a small part of it,

Mr. CLARK moved that the Committee should rise.

On the question for the Committee rising there were 50 in the affirmative, and 43 against it; it was carried.

The Committee hereupon rose, and reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

On granting leave to sit again, there was 53 in the affirmative, and the Speaker declared that, in his opinion, the question was carried.

TERRITORY OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed, on the twelfth of November last, on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates "to an amelioration of the form of government of the Territory of Louisiana," to whom was referred, on the 3d ultimo, a memorial, in the French language, with a translation thereof, from sundry planters, merchants, and other inhabitants of the said Territory of Louisiana, made a report, in part, thereupon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next. The report is as follows:

H. OF R.

Territory of Louisiana.

JANUARY, 1805.

The grievances which have been felt by the memorialists, are of a nature which your committee believe to be inseparable from those sudden transitions of government to which late political events have subjected the inhabitants of Louisiana. By them, however, they are ascribed to a denial, on the part of the United States, of those rights and immunities to which they declare themselves entitled, in virtue of the third article of the treaty which transferred them to our dominion, and to the immediate enjoyment of which they now claim to be admitted. It is only under the torture that this article of the Treaty of Paris can be made to speak the language ascribed to it by the memorialists, or countenance for a moment that charge of breach of faith, which they have conceived themselves justified in exhibiting against the Government. By that article it is stipulated that "the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities, of citizens of the United States, and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess."

"They shall be incorporated into the Union, and admitted"—to what? To the enjoyment of all the rights, &c., of American citizens. When? As soon as it can be done in conformity with the principles of the Federal Constitution; meanwhile they are to be "protected," &c.

Could any doubt be excited of the soundness of this construction of the English context, it would be instantly dissipated by a recurrence to its counterpart in the French language,* if the manifest absurdity of the concluding words of the article, which would result from an opposite interpretation, should fail to remove it. For what necessity could exist for a provision securing to the inhabitants of Louisiana the temporary enjoyment of certain minor privileges, when their immediate admission to all the rights of American citizens was one of the conditions on which their country was transferred to the United States by France? Whether the words "as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution," be understood to refer to any change, which, in conformity with its own principles, might at some future period be made in that instrument, or to that provision of the Constitution which requires the rule of naturalization to be uniform, they are equally fatal to the claim urged by the memorialists of their right to an immediate participation of those benefits which they cannot possess in their full extent until admitted to their enjoyment by the principles of the Constitution. The imputation, therefore, of a want of good faith in the Government of the United States, is not more unsupported by the language of the third article of the Treaty of Paris, than it is repugnant to the uniform tenor of the American character, from the commencement of the national existence.

But because the memorialists may have appreciated too highly the rights which have been secured to them by the treaty of cession, the claims of the people of Louisiana on the wisdom and justice of Congress ought not (in the opinion of your committee) to be thereby prejudiced. Relying on the good sense of that people to point out to them that the United States cannot have incurred a heavy debt in order to obtain the Territory of Louisiana merely with a view to the exclusive or especial benefit of its inhabitants, your committee, at the same time, earnestly recommend that every indulgence, not incompatible with the interests of the Union, may be extended to them. Only two modes present themselves whereby a dependent province may be held in obedience to its sovereign State—force and affection. The first of these is not only repugnant to all our principles and institutions of Government, but it could not be more odious to those on whom it might operate than it would be hostile to the best interests, as well as the dearest predilections, of those by whom, in this instance, it would have to be exercised. The United States are not the property of an hereditary despot, or the rich prize of a military adventurer, whose favorites and followers may batten on the spoil of plundered provinces won by the blood and treasure of their exhausted subjects, but they form the patrimony of a free and enlightened people, who control, while they constitute the only fund from which the men and the money of which military power is composed can be drawn. It can never be the interest, therefore, of the people of the United States to subject themselves to the burdens, and their liberties to the dangers, of a vast military force, for the subjugation of others. The only alternative, then, which presents itself, is believed to be not more congenial to the feelings than to the best interests of the people of the Union. So long as their authority pervades the Territory of Louisiana, so long as their laws are respected and obeyed therein, your committee are at a loss to conceive how the United States are more interested in the internal government of that Territory than of any State in the Confederacy. By permitting her inhabitants to form their own regulations, the voice of discontent would be hushed, faction (if it exist) disarmed, and the people bound to us by the strong ties of gratitude and interest. The spirit of disaffection, should it be excited at any future period by ambitious and unprincipled men, would be in direct hostility to the obvious interests of the people of Louisiana, while the ability of the Union to repress it would remain unimpaired.

In considering this subject, the committee have not been inattentive to those forms of provincial government which have heretofore obtained in the remote territories of the United States. But they have found nothing in them worthy of imitation. The second grade, as it is termed, is of the two less liable to objection, but there are many of its features which they are unable to recommend. Their object is to give to Louisiana a government of its own choice, administered by officers of its own appointment. In recommending the extension of this privilege to the people of that country, it is not the intention of the committee that it should be unaccompanied by wise and salutary restrictions. Among them may be numbered a prohibition of the importation of foreign slaves, a measure equally dictated by humanity and policy; restrictions against the establishment of any form of government, other than a representative Republic; against violations of the liberty of conscience, the freedom of the press, and the trial by jury; against the taxation of the lands of the United States; to which may be added (for further security) that such of the laws as may be disapproved by Congress, within a limited time after their passage, shall be of no force and effect. These, however, are objects which may be embraced in any bill which the wisdom of the Legislature may see fit to pass upon the subject. They will be proper subjects of consideration after the determination of the principal question, the extension of self-government to the people of Louisiana. Your committee, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for extending to the inhabitants of Louisiana the right of self-government.

[The following paper was subsequently presented to the House by the committee.]

After having considered with respectful attention the observations of the committee on the third article of the treaty of cession of Louisiana, we avail ourselves of the permission they have given us, to make such remarks as we conceive may be of some use towards the elucidation of the question on which is principally founded the claim of our constituents.

We have diligently and carefully examined the articles of the Constitution of the United States, which have been pointed out to us as having more or less relation to the present subject.

The first is the article which speaks in a direct and unquestionable manner of the admission of new States into the Union, in these words: "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union," &c. This article, the only one which expresses a clause respecting the admission of new States, makes no kind of restriction which can be applicable to Louisiana, and so far we find nothing that can prevent its incorporation.

The next article which has been quoted to us establishes the power of Congress to dispose of, and make all needful rules respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States. This, we humbly conceive, has no relation whatever with the situation of the inhabitants of Louisiana, and is evidently relative only to the disposal and management of the property of the United States.

Subsequently, it has been suggested that certain rules and regulations established in the year 1787, respecting the Territory northwest of the Ohio, are applicable to us, because they are considered as a part of the Constitutional laws, and, consequently, must be observed with respect to Louisiana, which is to be admitted into the Union according to the principles of the Constitution.

This observation leads to two queries: First, is the ordinance of 1787 to be considered as a part of the principles of the Constitution? Second, is it applicable to Louisiana?

Without questioning whether the ordinance of 1787 ought to be considered as an integral part of the rules established by the Constitution, though it appears to us extremely doubtful, we beg leave to say that it cannot be ranked among the principles of the Constitution. The principles of the Constitution we humbly conceive to be the fundamental laws common to all the members of the Confederation. This is only a local regulation, which, far from having anything to do with the principles of the Constitution, has been made, on the contrary, for those who could not enjoy yet the rights secured by the principles of the Constitution.

But in whatever light that ordinance may be considered, it can by no means be applicable to Louisiana. It is clearly and unquestionably limited to the Territory northwest of the Ohio; and unless it should have been stipulated afterwards in the Constitution that that regulation would be applicable to any other Territory thereafter to be acquired, it must have remained a local and private rule.

On the other hand we do not conceive what similitude can be found between our country and those territories. The Territory northwest of the Ohio, acquired by the right of war, was a vast desert, almost without any inhabitants, and was the absolute property of the United States. There was no compact, no contract of any kind stipulated by any nations in favor of any population. The United States, being bound by no stipulation whatever, were at full liberty to make such government as they thought fit for that Territory. But the case of Louisiana is evidently different. It is a country which contains already a numerous population, established in it since nearly one hundred years. It becomes a part of the United States by a solemn treaty, containing a positive clause in favor of its inhabitants. Now, to pretend that this engagement goes no further than applying to them the ordinances made for territories, in favor of which no stipulation existed, would be, we conceive, reducing to nothing the third article of the treaty of cession of Louisiana. That article does not stipulate that the inhabitants of the ceded Territory shall be admitted into the Union according to the acts made by Congress to regulate the rights of the inhabitants of the Territory northwest of the Ohio; it expresses, on the contrary, that the Louisianians shall be incorporated into the Union according to the principles (the elemental laws) of the Constitution. It is, therefore, in the Constitution that we must look to find on what principles the Louisianians are to be incorporated in it.

Other remarks have been made by the committee tending to show that the incorporation of the inhabitants of Louisiana into the Union cannot be executed without the consent of three-fourths of the several States. Without pretending to enter into any discussion upon subjects of that magnitude, the consideration of which appertains exclusively to the sovereign body of Congress, we will take the liberty to suggest, respectfully, that the treaty stipulates our incorporation into the Union, that the United States have accepted that condition, and that to place it, at the present period, in the power of the individual States to refuse that incorporation, would be exposing the Federal Government to the danger of not fulfilling their promise.

After having briefly stated the principal remarks which have occurred to our memory respecting the suggestions of the committee, we beg leave to present, with all due deference and respect, our own interpretation of the third article of the treaty of cession of our country.

We consider, in the first place, that the clause, which is the ground of our claim, is a stipulation made expressly in favor of the inhabitants of Louisiana then existing, because the French Government had no right to stipulate the incorporation of the future citizens of Louisiana. We think that the words "as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Constitution," evidently express that this incorporation is to be executed without any unnecessary delay, and that it is to take place on the same principles by which the Constitution has regulated the rights of the individual States, and of the citizens of the United States, in relation to the federal compact. We humbly think that any interpretation tending to procrastinate the incorporation of the present inhabitants of Louisiana into the Union is directly opposite to the spirit of the third article of cession of our country, the object of which is unquestionably to secure that advantage to the inhabitants who are annexed to the United States by that treaty; that, consequently, any condition depending on future circumstances ought to be inadmissible, because it would expose the inhabitants, who existed in Louisiana when the treaty was made, to be kept out of the enjoyment of rights which have been stipulated for them.

Such is our opinion, which we respectfully submit to the Committee, praying them to accept our thanks for the permission they have given us to express our sentiments on the subject, and to make some allowance for the disadvantage under which we labor to express them in a language which is not altogether familiar to us.

L. DERBIGNY,
P. SAUVE,
DESTREHAN,

Agents of the inhabitants of Louisiana.

MONDAY, January 28.

A petition of sundry purchasers of the lands of the United States in the State of Ohio was presented to the House and read, praying (for the reasons therein stated) that an extension of the time of future payments for the said lands may be granted by law, and also a remission of interest on the several instalments due on the same.—Referred to the committee appointed on the seventh instant, “to inquire whether any and what alterations are necessary to be made in the laws for the disposal of the public lands northwest of the Ohio.”

A petition of the members of the Presbyterian Congregation in Georgetown, in the Territory of Columbia, was presented to the House and read, praying that an act of incorporation may be passed, vesting in Stephen B. Balch and other persons therein named, and their successors, such powers, privileges, and immunities, as Congress in their wisdom may deem proper, to enable the petitioners, in behalf of the said congregation, to lease out on ground-rent, or sell, as they may deem expedient, for the purpose of defraying the expenses incident to their mode of worship, and to keep their buildings and grave-yards in decent repair.—Referred to Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. ARCHER, Mr. CUTLER, Mr. JONES, and Mr. BALDWIN.

Mr. J. CLAY, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

The House proceeded, by ballot, to the choice of a Manager, on the part of this House, to conduct the impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the place of Mr. NELSON, who hath been excused from serving on the subject-matter of the said impeachment; and, upon examining the ballots, Mr. CLARK was found to be duly elected by a majority of the votes of the whole House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they have passed a bill, entitled “An act to extend jurisdiction, in certain cases, to the State and Territorial courts;” to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

On motion, it was Resolved, That the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business be instructed to inquire whether any, and if any, what alterations are necessary in the “Act to prescribe the mode of taking evidence in cases of contested elections for members of the House of Representatives of the United States; and to compel the attendance of witnesses,” and that the committee be authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled “An act to extend jurisdiction in certain cases to the State and Territorial Courts,” was read twice, and committed to Mr. J. RANDOLPH, Mr. R. GRISWOLD, and Mr. J. CLAY, to consider and report thereon to the House.

On motion, it was Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the more effectual prevention of frauds and forgeries on the Bank of the United States, and that the committee be authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. J. CLAY, Mr. DENNIS, and Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred, on the ninth and sixteenth of November last, the petitions and memorials of a number of merchants, traders, and farmers, on the waters of Roanoke and Cashie rivers, in the district of Edenton, and State of North Carolina, made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

On motion, it was Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take into consideration the present situation of the grounds in the City of Washington, which were appropriated for the purpose of laying out public walks and gardens, and to report such measures to this House as may tend to carry into effect the original intention of the proprietors by whom the said lands were granted for public use.

Ordered, That Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. LIVINGSTON, Mr. VARNUM, Mr. HUGER, and Mr. SMILIE, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill authorizing the discharge of John York from his imprisonment; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report, in part, from the committee appointed on the twelfth of November last, on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to “an amelioration of the form of government of the Territory of Louisiana.” The Committee rose and reported a resolution thereupon, which was twice read and agreed to by the House, as follows:

JANUARY, 1805.

Georgia Claims.

H. OF R.

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for extending to the inhabitants of Louisiana the right of self-government.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. J. RANDOLPH, Mr. R. GRISWOLD, Mr. T. MOORE, Mr. SMILIE, Mr. DWIGHT, and Mr. SAMMONS, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on a motion relative to "a provision by law for defraying the expense incident to fitting and preparing one of the navy yards belonging to the United States, and lying near the margin of the sea, for the reception and repairing of such ships of war as are now at sea, on their return to port, and such other ships or vessels of war as may hereafter return from their cruises or stations," referred on the twenty-fourth instant; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported a resolution thereupon, which the House proceeded to consider, when the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 29.

Another member, to wit: OLIVER PHELPS, from New York, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, stating his intention of complying with the resolution of this House of the twenty-third instant, relative "to the situation of the public buildings on the banks of the Schuylkill, near the city of Philadelphia," so soon as the necessary information can be obtained from the superintendent of military stores of the United States.—Ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill authorizing the discharge of John York from his imprisonment was read the third time, and passed.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole on the subject-matter of a motion referred to the said Committee, on the twenty-fourth instant, relative to "a proviso, by law, for defraying the expense incident to fitting out and preparing one of the navy yards belonging to the United States, and lying near the margin of the ocean; for the reception and repairing of such ships of war as are now at sea on their return to port, and such other ships or vessels of war as may hereafter return from their cruises or stations."

And debate arising thereon, the farther consideration of the resolution was postponed until Saturday next.

Mr. THOMAS, from the committee appointed, the eighteenth ultimo, on a petition of Joshua Sands and others, inhabitants and freeholders of the counties of King's and Queen's, in the State of New York, reported a bill to authorize the erection of a bridge across a mill-pond and marsh in the navy yard belonging to the United States, in the town of Brooklyn, in the State of New York; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

GEORGIA CLAIMS.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the Georgia claims.

After reading over the report of the Committee of Claims, which concludes with submitting the following resolution:

Resolved, That three Commissioners be authorized to receive propositions of compromise and settlement, from the several companies or persons having claims to public lands within the present limits of the Mississippi Territory, and finally to adjust and settle the same in such manner as in their opinion will conduce to the interest of the United States: Provided, That in such settlement the Commissioners shall not exceed the limits prescribed by the convention with the State of Georgia.

Mr. DANA moved that the Committee rise and report the resolution.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH wished before the Committee rose that the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DANA) would assign some reasons for the adoption of the resolution. No two things could be more opposite than the prefatory statement made by the Committee of Claims and the resolution which terminated the report. As there were no reasons assigned, he suspected the gentleman had kept them back with a view of surprising the House by their novelty; but he hoped the Committee would not agree to the motion, unless some better cause was assigned for its adoption than had been hitherto made known.

Mr. DANA said the Committee of Claims, in the report now before the Committee of the Whole, had confined themselves to a statement of facts derived from the documents referred to them. He conceived it to be the business of the Committee of Claims to investigate the facts, and arrange them in such a manner as to free the House from the labor of detail; they had done this, and the report was a summary of all that passed in review before them. It was left to gentlemen to reason on the case according to their course of reflection. Whether the committee reasoned on the subject well or ill, he did not know that gentlemen were bound to follow them in their conclusion. Indeed, he apprehended that were the reasoning ever so energetic, it would not go to satisfy every gentleman. On a question like the present, he despaired of making it satisfactory to the gentleman who had asked for reasons. He was persuaded that gentleman could not be convinced by any argument the committee might have used, and it was idle to call upon them to perform impossibilities.

The question on the Committee's rising and reporting their agreement to the resolution was put, and carried—yeas 61, nays 50.

The SPEAKER having resumed the Chair, Mr. VARNUM reported the foregoing resolution as agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN called for the reading of that rule of the House which restrains interested persons from voting.

The Clerk read the same, as follows:

"No member shall vote on any question in the event of which he is immediately and particularly interested; or in any other case where he was not present when the question was put."

A motion was made to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole, and carried—yeas 64, nays 51.

Mr. CLARK moved a proviso as an amendment, declaring that no part of the five millions of acres reserved should go to compensate the claimants under the act of Georgia, passed in 1795.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH called the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. DANA observed that the report on the table had been made on the application of persons claiming land under the act of 1795. The amendment, said he, is nothing more or less than a denial to comply with the prayer of the petitioners, and whether it was not to all intents and purposes a substitute for the resolutions agreed to in the Committee of the Whole, he would leave to the Speaker. If it were decided to be a substitute, it could not be received, conformably to the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER said, the resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole was a general one, including all claims; the amendment went to limit and confine the resolution to a particular class, and, therefore, he conceived it to be in order.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—It must be manifest to the House that this discussion is forced upon those who are opposed to the report of the Committee; that we are not prepared at this time to meet it. I am among those who hoped that some reasons would be assigned, if indeed reasons can be found, to warrant the step about to be taken. I did hope that, instead of a string of facts and statements which were already before the House, the Committee would have given us something new in the shape of argument, justificatory of the resolution which they have recommended. But I have been disappointed. Nothing is offered either in the report itself, or in debate, which throws a single gleam of light on the subject. I have particular reasons to deprecate a discussion at this time. I shall not trouble the House by detailing them, but briefly state that I feel myself unequal to an immediate investigation of this question, as well from personal indisposition as from the pressure of other important business, which has left me but little leisure to attend to this. The few moments which I have been able to devote to it, have convinced me that much new and important matter remains to be brought to light. But no apology will be received: we are driven to a vote by an inflexible majority.

The objection taken by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) and the doubt which he raised on the point of order, respecting the amendment offered by my worthy colleague, (Mr. CLARK,) discloses his drift, and that of the Committee of Claims, whilst it proves the necessity of some such amendment to save citizens of the United States and their property from spoliation and plunder. The gentleman has stated truly that his object was to further the claim of the New England Mississippi Land Company. As I fear I shall have full occasion to exert my voice,

I must beg that the memorial of the agents of that company may be read by the Clerk.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH then called for the reading of the act of Georgia of February, 1796, generally called the rescinding act; and he hoped they would have silence whilst the act was reading, as it was a very important one, and ought to influence the decision on the present subject.

The act was read in compliance with the request.

After it was finished, Mr. CLARK moved to adjourn.

On the division, there was 52 yeas, and 55 nays. So the motion was lost.

Mr. CLARK requested that the act of 1795, under which they derived their pretended titles, might be read.

Whilst the SPEAKER was reading the same, Mr. DANA rose and inquired whether it was necessary to read the whole of the law, or whether gentlemen would not be satisfied with the reading of such part of it as bore upon the present question.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH called the gentleman to order for interrupting the Speaker in his reading.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The objection ought to have been made (if at all) when the reading of the law was first called for.

The reading was continued to the end of the act—when,

Mr. J. CLAY moved that the House adjourn. On a division there were 53 yeas, and 60 nays. Motion lost.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—Perhaps it may be supposed, from the course which this business has taken, that the adversaries of the present measure indulge the expectation of being able to come forward, at a future day—not to this House, for that hope is desperate, but to the public, with a more matured opposition than it is in their power now to make. But past experience has shown them that this is one of those subjects which pollution has sanctified; that the hallowed mysteries of corruption are not to be profaned by the eye of public curiosity. No, sir, the orgies of Yazoo speculation are not to be laid open to the vulgar gaze. None but the initiated are permitted to behold the monstrous sacrifice of the best interests of the nation on the altars of corruption. When this abomination is to be practised we go into conclave. Do we apply to the press? that potent engine the dread of tyrants and of villains, but the shield of freedom and of worth? No, sir, the press is gagged. On this subject we have a virtual sedition law—not with a specious title, but irresistible in its operation, which, in the language of a gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) goes directly to its object. The demon of speculation, at one sweep, has wrested from the nation their best, their only defence, and closed every avenue of information. But a day of retribution may yet come. If their rights are to be bartered away and their property squandered, the people must not, they shall not be kept in ignorance by whom, or for whom it is done.

We have often heard of party spirit—of caucuses as they are termed—to settle legislative questions, but never have I seen that spirit so visible as at this time. The out-of-door intrigue is too palpable to be disguised. When it was proposed to abolish a judiciary system reared in the last moments of an expiring Administration, the detested offspring of a midnight hour—when the question of repeal was before this House, it could not be taken up until midnight, in the third or fourth week of the discussion. When the great and good man who now fills, and who (whatever may be the wishes of our opponents) I hope and trust will long fill the Executive chair, not less to his own honor than to the happiness of his fellow-citizens; when he, sir, recommended the repeal of the internal taxes, delay succeeded delay, and discussion was followed by discussion, until patience itself was worn threadbare. But now, when public plunder is the order of the day, how are we treated? Driven into the Committee of the Whole, and out again in a breath, by an inflexible majority, exulting and stubborn in their strength, a decision must be had instantaneously. The advocates for the proposed measure feel that it will not bear a scrutiny. Hence this precipitancy. They wince from the touch of examination, and are willing to hurry through a painful and disgraceful discussion. But it may be asked why this tenacious adherence of certain gentlemen to each other on every other point connected with this subject. As if animated by one spirit, they perform all their evolutions with the most exact discipline, and march in a firm phalanx directly up to their object. Is it that men combined to effect some evil purpose, acting on previous pledge to each other, are ever more in unison than those who, seeking only to discover truth, obey the impulse of that conscience which God has placed in their bosoms? Such men do not stand compromised. They will not stifle the suggestions of their own minds, and sacrifice their private opinions to the attainment of some common, perhaps some nefarious object.

Having given vent to that effusion of indignation which I feel, and which I trust I shall never fail to feel and to express on this detestable subject, permit me now to offer some crude and hasty remarks on the point in dispute. They will be directed chiefly to the claim of the New England Mississippi Land Company, whom we propose to debar (with all the other claimants under the act of 1795) from any benefit of the five millions of acres, reserved by our compact with Georgia, to satisfy such claims not specially provided for in that compact, as we might find worthy of recompense. I shall direct my observations more particularly to this claim, because it has been more insisted upon, and more zealously defended than any other. It is alleged by the memorialists, who style themselves the agents of that company, that they, and those whom they represent, were innocent purchasers; in other words, ignorant of the corruption and fraud by which the act from which their pretended title was derived, was passed. I am well aware that this fact is not material to the question of any legal or equitable title which they may set up; but as it has been made a pretext for exciting the compassion of the Legislature, I wish to examine into the ground upon which this allegation rests. Sir, when that act of stupendous villany was passed in 1795, attempting under the forms and semblance of law to rob unborn millions of their birthright and inheritance, and to convey to a band of unprincipled and flagitious men a territory more extensive, and beyond comparison more fertile than any State of this Union, it caused a sensation scarcely less violent than that produced by the passage of the stamp act, or the shutting up of the port of Boston, with this difference: that when the port bill of Boston passed, her Southern brethren did not take advantage of the forms of law, by which a corrupt Legislature attempted to defraud her of the bounty of nature; they did not speculate on the necessities and wrongs of their abused and insulted countrymen. I repeat that this infamous act was succeeded by a general burst of indignation throughout the continent. This is matter of public notoriety, and those—I speak of men of education and intelligence, purchasers, too, of the very country in question—those who affect to have been ignorant of any such circumstance, I shall consider as guilty of gross and wilful prevarication. They offer indeed to virtue the only homage which she is ever likely to receive at their hands—the homage of their hypocrisy. They could not make an assertion within the limits of possibility less entitled to credit.

Yes, the act of the 7th of January, 1795, excited emotions of detestation and abhorrence, equal to those produced by the stamp act, or port bill of Boston. But this was not all. It drew upon it the immediate attention of the Federal Government. The authority which is about to be produced to the House is one which I am not in the habit of prostituting to every light occasion. It is one from which those who are daily endeavoring to shelter their crimes and their follies under its venerable shade, will not dare to appeal. Upon looking into the Journals of this House, I find the following Message from the President, dated on the 17th of February, 1795:

“Gentlemen of the Senate, and House of Representatives:”

“I have received copies of two acts of the Legislature of Georgia, one passed on the 28th day of December, 1794.” [This, sir, is the act which the wavering virtue of the Governor induced him to reject.] “The other on the 7th of January, 1795,” [The act under which the different companies, from one of which the memorialists derive their pretended title, claim] “for appropriating and selling the Indian lands within the territorial limits claimed by that State. These copies, though not officially certified, have been transmitted to me in such a manner as to leave no room to doubt their authenticity. These acts embrace an object of such magnitude, and in their consequences may so deeply affect the peace and welfare of the United States, that I have thought it necessary now to lay them before Congress.”

Here, sir, is ample notice to the whole world.

This message was referred to a select committee; consisting of Mr. JOHN NICHOLAS, Mr. MACON, Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. BOUDINOT, Mr. AMES, and Mr. SHERBURNE, on whose report, after solemn deliberation in the Committee of the Whole, the House, on the 26th of the same month, came to the following resolution: "Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to obtain a cession from the State of Georgia of their claim to the whole, or any part, of the land within the present Indian boundaries." The very land which the act of the 7th of January had attempted to alienate and sell; and the bill which I now hold in my hand was accordingly brought in, pursuant to the resolution, and passed the House on the 2d day of March. But, unfortunately, the session closed, of necessity, on the following day, and this House is well apprized that the forms of the Senate will not permit any bill to be hurried through that body. A single negative is sufficient to prevent it. The subject was not suffered however to sleep. An act was subsequently passed opening a negotiation with Georgia for the territory in question, of which we have received from her a solemn transfer. Is this notice, or is it not? On a formal Message of the President laying before them the act of 1795—so totally invalid and worthless was that act in their eyes; in such utter contempt did they hold the pretended rights of the grantees under it; that the House of Representatives immediately passed a bill empowering the President to receive a grant of the very land which that act had previously and fraudulently attempted to convey to the four companies. With what face could the President recommend, or Congress endeavor to obtain from Georgia a cession of the whole, or any part of the land within her Indian boundaries, if they believed that the land in question had been conveyed to others by a fair and bona fide sale?—if they attached to the act of January, 1795, any idea of validity? The man who answers this objection shall have my thanks. But, perhaps I shall be told that this was the act of a single branch of the Legislature, and not a law. True, sir, but it was a solemn avowment to the whole world that Congress had a right to legislate on the subject. It was notice, on the 17th and 26th days of February, 1794, that the act passed by the State of Georgia, in the preceding month, was void and of no effect—it was loudly proclaimed by the convention of that State, which met in the succeeding May, and was finally consummated by the rescinding act of the 13th of February, 1796, which was subsequently ingrafted on the constitution of Georgia. And yet the New England Mississippi Land Company, under a deed of contemporaneous date (as they say) with this last act, a deed containing not merely a special warranty, but a special covenant that no recourse shall be had against the sellers, for any defect of title in them; a covenant which clearly indicates notice on the part of the buyers of such defect; claiming under a deed by which they purchase such title only as the grantees of 1795 had to sell, in whose stead and place they agree to stand, this company affect to have no notice of any defect of title in those of whom they bought. Sanction the claim of this company, or any other derived from the act of 1795, and what in effect do you declare? You record a solemn acknowledgment that Congress have unfairly and dishonestly obtained from Georgia a grant of land to which that State no longer possessed a title, having previously sold it to others for a valuable consideration, of which transaction Congress was at the time fully apprized. Are you prepared to make this humiliating confession? To identify yourselves with the swindlers of 1795? To acknowledge that you have unfairly obtained from another that to which you know he had no title? I trust, sir, we have not yet reached this point of moral and political depravity.

The agents of the New England Land Company are unfortunate in two points. They set out with a formal endeavor to prove that they are entitled to their proportion of fifty millions of acres of land, under the law of 1795, and this they make their plea to be admitted to a proportional share of five. If they really believed what they say, would they be willing to commute a good legal, or equitable claim for one tenth of its value? Their memorial contains moreover a suggestion of falsehood. They aver that the reservation of five millions for satisfying claims not otherwise provided for, in our compact with Georgia, was specially intended for the benefit of the claimants under the act of 1795, and that we are pledged to satisfy them out of that reservation. Now, sir, turn to the sixth volume of your laws, and what is the fact? In the first place, so much of the reserved five millions, as may be necessary, is appropriated specifically for satisfying claims derived from British grants not regranted by Spain; and as much of the residue as may be necessary is appropriated for compensating other claims, not recognised in our compact with Georgia. An appropriation for certain British grants specially, and for other claims generally, is falsely suggested to have been made for the especial benefit of the claimants of 1795; and the reservation of a power in the United States to quiet such claims as they should deem worthy of compensation, is perverted into an obligation to compensate a particular class of claims; into an acknowledgment that such claims are worthy of compensation. Can this House be inveigled by such barefaced effrontery? Sir, the act containing this appropriation clause was not brought to a third reading till the first of March. Our powers expired on the fourth: it was at the second session of the seventh Congress. It was in the power of those opposed to the corrupt claims of 1795 to have defeated the bill by a discussion. But, sir, they abstained on this ground. If the appropriation of the five millions had not been made at that session, the year within which, by our agreement with Georgia, it was to be made, if at all, would have expired before the meeting of the next Congress; and it was urged, by the friends of the bill, that there were several descriptions of claims to which no imputation of fraud could attach; that by making a general appropriation we secured to ourselves the power of recompensing such claims as, on examination, might be found worthy of it, whilst we pledged ourselves to no class of claimants whatever. But that if we should suffer the term specified, in our compact with Georgia, to elapse without making any appropriation, we should preclude ourselves from the ability to compensate any claims, not specially provided for, however just and reasonable we might find them, on investigation, to be. Under these circumstances, and I appeal to my excellent friend from Maryland, who brought it in, for the correctness of my statement, the opponents of the bill gave it no other opposition than a silent vote. And now, sir, we are told that we stand pledged, and that an appropriation for British grants not regranted by Spain, specially, and for such other claims against the State of Georgia, generally, as Congress should find quietworthy, was made for the especial benefit of a particular description of claimants, branded, too, with the deepest odium; who dare to talk to us of public faith, and appeal to the national honor!

The conclusion of the memorial is amusing enough. After having played over the farce, which was acted by the Yazoo Squad at the last session, affecting to believe that an appropriation has been made by the act of March 1803, for their especial benefit, they pray that Congress will be pleased to give them—what? that to which they assert they are entitled?—by no means—an eighth or tenth part of it—which said eighth or tenth part, if we may credit them, has been already appropriated to their use by law. From a knowledge of the memorialists, and those whom they represent, can you believe for a moment that, if they had the least faith in the volume of argument (I am sorry to profane the word) which they presented to the House to prove the goodness of their title, can you believe that under such impression they would accept a paltry compromise of two shillings in the pound—much less that, to obtain it, they would descend so low! Sir, when these men talk about public faith and national honor, they remind me of the appeals of the unprincipled gamester and veteran usurer to the honor of the thoughtless spendthrift, whilst in reality they are addressing themselves to his vices and his folly.

I have confined myself on this occasion principally to the question of notice, because it has been made an engine to play upon the generous feelings of many, and not because I deemed it material to the question of title. It is not my intention to travel over the ground which I occupied at the last session on the following important points: that Georgia had no right to make the sale; that even if she had, the contract, being laid in corruption and fraud, was null and void, ab initio: that, consequently, the question of notice was not material to the question of title, in the hands of third persons; since, the original grant being obtained by bribery and fraud, no right could vest under it; and that the grantees of 1795 could not sell a greater, or better title, than they themselves possessed: and that, even if these positions were as false as they are indisputably true, the present case presents a monstrous anomaly, to which the ordinary and narrow maxims of municipal jurisprudence ought not, and cannot be applied. It is from great first principles, to which the patriots of Georgia so gloriously appealed, that we must look for aid in such extremity. Yes, extreme cases, like this, call for extreme remedies. They bid defiance to palliatives, and it is only from the knife, or the actual cautery, that you can expect relief. There is no cure short of extirpation. Attorneys and judges do not decide the fate of empires.

The right of the State of Georgia to sell (although I do not propose to go largely into that question) is denied by your own statute book, by turning to which you will find, that so far from being able to transfer to others the right of extinguishing Indian title to the land, she has not been able to exercise it for her own benefit. It is only through the agency of the United States that she can obtain the extinguishment of Indian title to the soil within her limits, much less could she delegate it to a few Yazoo men. But, as has been repeatedly stated on former discussions of this subject, even if the question of right on the part of Georgia to sell, and on the part of the grantees to take, be conceded, it cannot be controverted that the fraudulent and corrupt attempt of the Legislature of 1795, to betray the interests of those who had confided in them, was, ipso facto, void; that no right could be vested, by it, in the instigators and participators of the fraud, and that these could not convey to others a better title than they themselves possessed. If the authority were worth anything, I myself would cite that of the memorialists themselves and of the Committee of Claims, in support of this position. It is allowed by these authorities, that the title of the purchasers, at second and third hand, is diminished in the ratio which the five millions of acres bears to the whole territory, which they modestly admit to contain thirty-five millions of acres, although there is the best reason to believe it to be nearer fifty. Now, sir, they have not condescended to explain to us by what legerdemain it comes to pass, that a title to thirty-five millions of acres (to take their own statement) is depreciated in their hands so fearfully as to quantity—is reduced to one seventh of its value, whilst the quality of the title to that seventh is proportionally raised. Plain honest men would reason very differently. A man of this stamp would argue somewhat in this way: If the corrupt and corrupting grantees of 1795, sold a claim to thirty-five millions of acres to third persons, surely those persons would have the same title to the whole of the property which they had purchased, that they could pretend to set up to any part of it. It would never occur to such a man, that whilst, as to quality, these persons had bought a better title than the vendors themselves had to sell, yet, by some unintelligible process, this better title was in quantity, and of course in value, wasted in their hands to one seventh part of its original worth: in other words was seven times worse, and at the same time better, than the title of the original grantees. Discoveries such as these have been reserved for the profound legal learning of the agents of the New England Mississippi Land Company, and the ingenuity of the Committee of Claims! What, sir, would you say to a pretender to your estate, who after laying claim to the whole of it, and writing a volume of arguments (if I may so abuse the term as to apply it to the sophisticated trash which I hold in my hand) in support of his pretensions, should make it the groundwork of a proposal to receive a seventh, or a tenth part of what he declared himself legally and equitably intitled to, and should at the same time affirm that you were "bound in honor" to accede to his modest, considerate, and generous proposition? Would you not scout him from your presence as a swindler, as a disturber of the peace of society; or would you be trepanned by his artifice, or bullied by his effrontery, out of your property?

The Government of the United States, on a former occasion, did not, indeed, act in this firm and decided manner. But those were hard, unconstitutional times, which ought never to be drawn into precedent. The first year that I had the honor of a seat in this House, an act was passed of a nature not altogether unlike the one now proposed. I allude to the case of the Connecticut Reserve, by which the nation were swindled out of some three or four millions of acres of land, which, like other bad titles, had fallen into the hands of innocent purchasers. When I advert to the applicants by whom we were then beset, I find that among them was one of the very persons who style themselves agents of the New England Mississippi Land Company, who seems to have an unfortunate knack at buying bad titles. His gigantic grasp embraces with one hand the shores of Lake Erie, and stretches with the other to the Bay of Mobile. Millions of acres are easily digested by such stomachs. Goaded by avarice, they buy only to sell, and sell only to buy. The retail trade of fraud and imposture yields too small and slow a profit to gratify their cupidity. They buy and sell corruption in the gross, and a few millions, more or less, is hardly felt in the account. The deeper the play, the greater their zest for the game, and the stake which is set upon their throw is nothing less than the patrimony of the people. Mr. Speaker, when I see the agency that has been employed on this occasion, I must own that it fills me with apprehension and alarm. This same agent is at the head of an Executive department of our Government, subordinate indeed in rank and dignity, and in the ability required for its superintendence, but inferior to none in the influence attached to it. This officer, possessed of how many snug appointments and fat contracts, let the voluminous records on your table, of the mere names and dates and sums declare; having an influence which is confined to no quarter of the country, but pervading every part of the Union; with offices in his gift amongst the most lucrative, and at the same time the least laborious, or responsible, under the Government, so tempting as to draw a member of the other House from his seat, and place him as a deputy at the feet of your applicant; this officer presents himself at your bar, at once a party and an advocate. Sir, when I see this tremendous patronage brought to bear upon us, I do confess that it strikes me with consternation and dismay. Is it come to this? Are heads of Executive departments of the Government to be brought into this House, with all the influence and patronage attached to them, to extort from us, now, what was refused at the last session of Congress? I hope not, sir. But if they are, and if the abominable villany practised upon, and by the Legislature of Georgia, in 1795, is now to be glossed over, I for one will ask what security they, by whom it shall be done, can offer for their reputations, better than can be given for the character of that Legislature? I will pin myself upon this text, and preach upon it as long as I have life. If no other reason can be adduced but a regard for our own fame, if it were only to rescue ourselves from this foul imputation, this weak and dishonorable compromise ought to receive a prompt and decisive rejection. Is the voice of patriotism lulled to rest, that we no longer hear the cry against an overbearing majority, determined to put down the Constitution, and deaf to every proposition of compromise? Such were the dire forebodings to which we have been heretofore compelled to listen. But if the enmity of such men be formidable, their friendship is deadly destruction, their touch pollution.

What is the spirit against which we now struggle, and which we have vainly endeavored to stifle? A monster generated by fraud, nursed in corruption, that in grim silence awaits his prey. It is the spirit of Federalism! That spirit which considers the many as made only for the few, which sees in Government nothing but a job, which is never so true to itself as when false to the nation! When I behold a certain party supporting and clinging to such a measure, almost to a man, I see only men faithful to their own principles; pursuing, with steady step and untired zeal, the uniform tenor of their political life. But when I see associated with them, in firm compact, others who once rallied under the standard of opposite principles, I am filled with apprehension and concern. Of what consequence is it that a man smiles in your face, holds out his hand and declares himself the advocate of those political principles to which you are also attached, when you see him acting with your adversaries upon other principles, which the voice of the nation has put down, which I did hope were buried, never to rise again in this section of the globe? I speak of the plunder of the public property. Say what we will, the marrow and pith of this business will be found in the character of the great majority of its friends, who stand, as they have before stood on this floor, the unblushing advocates of unblushing corruption. But this, it may be said, is idle declamation. We may be told, as we have been told before, that the squanderers of the public treasure are the guardians of the people against their worst enemies—themselves; that, to protect them from further dilapidation, it is necessary to give this Cerberus of corruption, this many-headed dog of hell, a sop; that it is to your interest to pacify him; and this sentiment is re-echoed by his yells. Good God! Sir, can you believe, can any man believe it? Is there a woman or child in the country weak enough to credit it—that a set of speculators, out of pure regard to the public interest, are willing to sacrifice thirty millions of acres of land? that they press their offer to accept a seventh or a tenth of their claim, from motives of patriotism? Can you believe that their love of country has got the better of their avarice; that their virtue is equal to such a sacrifice at the shrine of the public welfare? Such men, I repeat it, are formidable as enemies, but their friendship is fraught with irresistible death. I fear indeed the “Danaos et dona ferentes.” But, after the law in question shall have passed, what security have you that the claimants will accede to your terms of compromise? that this is not a trap, to obtain from Congress something like a recognition of their title, to be hereafter used against us? Sir, with all our wisdom, I seriously doubt our ability to contend with the arts and designs of these claimants, if they can once entangle us in the net of our own legislation. Let the act of March, 1801, of which already they have made so dextrous a use, be remembered. They themselves have pointed out the course which we ought to pursue. They have told us, that so long as we refrain from legislating on this subject, their case is hopeless. Let us then persevere in a “wise and masterly inactivity.”

Whenever a bill shall be introduced, in conformity to the principles of the report, if such should unfortunately be the decision of the House, I trust that some gentleman, more competent than myself, will be ready to give it a more effectual opposition. My weak health and want of preparation unfits me for the task. But, sir, if this claim is to be admitted, I hope we shall not fail to go the whole length of our principles; that we shall not narrow down to five millions of acres a legal or equitable title to fifty. If Congress shall determine to sanction this fraud upon the public, I trust in God we shall hear no more of the crimes and follies of the former Administration. For one, I promise that my lips upon this subject shall be closed in eternal silence. I should disdain to prate about the petty larcenies of our predecessors, after having given my sanction to this atrocious public robbery. Their petty delinquencies will vanish before it, as the stars of the firmament fade at the effulgent approach of a Summer's sun.

The Committee rose, and had leave to sit again, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 30.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether SAMUEL HAMMOND, a member of this House, has not accepted of an Executive appointment, and when?

Ordered, That Mr. BRYAN and Mr. EPPES be appointed a committee to present the foregoing resolution to the President of the United States.

GEORGIA CLAIMS.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution reported yesterday, from the Committee of the Whole, on the Georgia Claims.

Mr. ELLIOT.—It cannot but be considered as a very fortunate circumstance, and one which cannot fail to have a favorable influence upon the final decision of this important question, that, since the delivery of the animated observations which yesterday so powerfully attracted the attention of the House, we have been afforded a few hours of tranquil retirement from the tempest of the forum, for the purpose, useful at all times, and peculiarly so at the present time, of calm reflection. To transfer ourselves in a moment from the flowery fields of fancy, to the rugged road of argument, to descend instantaneously from the elevated scenes of eloquence to the humble walks of common sense, requires an effort transcending ordinary powers. In claiming your attention, Mr. Speaker, for a greater portion of the day than I commonly occupy in debate upon this floor, I shall not address you in the style of compliment or ceremony. It is time to banish from these walls that idle frippery of ceremonious conversation, which is suited only to a new year's compliment, or a birth-day salutation, and to catch a little of the sturdy spirit of antiquity. A bold, a loud, an impressive appeal is made to the American people. In that appeal I fearlessly and most cordially unite. I regret, however, the existence of a precedent which at once justifies and demands these addresses to the people. Much as I wish to disseminate correct information, particularly on a subject which I believe is but imperfectly understood without these walls, except by interested persons, and convinced as I am that the subject is understood, and an opinion formed upon it, by every member of this House, I shall not so completely follow the example before us as to speak to the people in the first instance, but shall, as usual, direct my observations to the House.

I propose to examine, in a concise, and if it be in my power, in an argumentative manner, the following questions, which have a direct application to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. CLARK) to the resolution under consideration, and which, at the same time, open to view the whole extent of the subject:

Did the State of Georgia, in the year 1795, possess a title to the territory in question?

Were the Legislature of Georgia, in 1795, invested with the Constitutional power of making a sale of the territory, and did they make such sale to those from whom the present claimants derive their title or pretended title? And if such sale was made, what title or color of title did it convey?

Were the members of the Legislature of Georgia, in 1796, invested with the Constitutional power of rescinding the acts of their predecessors in relation to such sale, and did they rescind them?

Were the claims or pretended claims of the present claimants in any manner recognised by the act of cession of the territory in question from Georgia to the United States? And,

Do justice and policy, or either justice or policy, require that the whole or any part of the five millions of acres, reserved by the act of cession from Georgia to the United States, for the purpose of satisfying claims of a certain description against Georgia, in reference to the said territory, should be appropriated for the purpose of satisfying the claims of the present claimants?

However extensive the outline which I have sketched of the subject, the survey will be a rapid one.

It is necessary that I should make one or two preliminary observations. I have uniformly been opposed to the doctrine which has been so powerfully advocated, that Congress is competent to make a legislative decision upon the validity or invalidity of the conflicting acts of Georgia. We possess no such powers. But as individuals we may express our opinions. Nor am I disposed to do anything which shall have a tendency to impugn the title of the United States to this territory. Without deciding the question of title, my principal object is to show that the claimants are in possession of so strong a color of title, that it will be good policy to authorize a negotiation with them for the abandonment of their claim, especially as we have a prospect of obtaining that abandonment on their part, without going beyond the reservation in the act of cession, and of course without the actual expense of a single dollar to the United States.

Did the State of Georgia, in the year 1795, possess a title to the territory in question?

To answer this inquiry, it is only necessary to make one or two quotations from the articles of agreement and cession, entered into on the 24th of April 1802, between the Commissioners of the United States and those of Georgia. In the first article, "the State of Georgia cedes to the United States all the right, title and claim, which the said State has to the jurisdiction and soil of the lands situated within the boundaries of the United States south of the State of Tennessee," &c. By the second article, "The United States accept the cession above-mentioned, and on the condition therein expressed; and they cede to the State of Georgia whatever claim, right, or title, they may have to the jurisdiction or soil of any lands lying within the United States, and out of the proper boundaries of any other State, and situated south of the southern boundaries of the States of Tennessee, North Carolina, and east of the boundary line herein above described, at the eastern boundary of the territory ceded by Georgia to the United States." Whatever claim or title the United States might previously have had to the territory, they thought proper, in 1802, to combine with it, and to fortify it, by that of Georgia; and surely we shall not do any act, or adopt any principle, tending to impair the title under which we now exercise jurisdiction over the territory.

Were the Legislature of Georgia, in 1795, invested with the Constitutional power of making a sale of the territory, and did they make such sale to those from whom the present claimants derive their title or pretended title? And if such sale was made, what title or color of title did it convey?

In this age of political revolution and reformation, for I consider it an age of reformation as well as revolution, there are still certain principles and maxims, not merely venerable for their antiquity, but consecrated by their conformity to the common sense and reason of mankind, which are considered as universal in their application, and irresistible in their influence. Among these may be numbered the principles which attach to the government of every regularly organized community; the power of pledging the public faith, and that of alienating the right of soil of the vacant territory of the nation. In every free government, there must exist the power of legislation, or of making laws; a distinct power, charged with the execution of the laws, and a judicial power. The union of these different powers in the same man or body of men, is the very essence of despotism. Thus in France, prior to the Revolution, it was a fundamental maxim of State that the King was the Legislator of the French Monarchy; and the power exercised in some instances by certain parliaments, of refusing to register the edicts of the monarch, however in practice it might operate as an obstruction to legislation, was in theory only a matter of form, or at most but a temporary check upon the executive power. In oligarchies the legislative power is vested in the rich and noble; and in aristocracies, in a few individuals who are presumed to be the wisest and the best in the community.—In governments of the democratic form, this power resides in the great body of the people, and is exercised by themselves or their representatives. The base of the temple of American liberty is democracy, or the sovereignty of the people; representation and confederation are the principal pillars which support the great superstructure. As the State governments are unquestionably representative democracies, the General Government is a representative federal republic. In every government of the representative form, the representatives of the people are vested with power to pledge the public faith, and to alienate the vacant territory of the nation. Were the members of the Legislature of Georgia, in 1795, invested with this authority? Certainly it was within the sphere of those Constitutional rights and powers, which had never been surrendered to the General Government. We have since recognised that authority by receiving a solemn deed of cession of the territory, from a subsequent Legislature of Georgia, transferring to us not only the soil, but the right of jurisdiction. Was this authority exercised in 1795? In the act of the Legislature of that State of the 7th of January in that year, granting this territory to those from whom the present claimants derive their claims, certain lands are described, and it is enacted that those lands shall be sold to such and such persons, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants. The land shall be sold, or, in other words, the right of soil shall be alienated. A proper distinction is taken between the dominium utile and the dominium directum of the civilians. No transfer was made of the right of jurisdiction, although such imaginary transfer forms a prominent article in the reasons assigned by the Legislature of 1796 for passing the rescinding act. From this view of the subject, whatever may be the present state of the question of legal title, who can doubt that the present claimants, honest purchasers from the original grantees, upon the faith of an independent State, and innocent of fraud, if fraud existed, possess such a color of title, such an equitable claim, as to render it prudent and politic to enter into a compromise with them upon reasonable terms?

Were the members of the Legislature of Georgia, in 1796, invested with the Constitutional power of rescinding the acts of their predecessors in relation to such sale, and did they rescind them?

Congress is incompetent to the decision of this question. Nor is such decision necessary. I will, however, make one or two inquiries, and state one or two principles, which are applicable to the subject, which at the same time will go to strengthen the ground I have taken as to color of title in the claimants, and the policy of extinguishing their claims.

Can a Legislature rescind a contract made by its predecessors?

Writers on national law make a distinction between laws which operate in the nature of contracts, and those which have no such operation. Every enlightened and reasonable man will subscribe to the opinion that a pledge of the public faith, given by the competent authority, ought to be irrevocable. Laws which pledge the faith of the community, which create contracts, which vest rights in individuals or in corporate bodies, it may safely be assumed as a general principle, are irrepealable. Laws of merely municipal operation are alterable or repealable at the pleasure of the existing Legislature.

Can the judicial power declare a Legislative act void, as having been passed by means of corruption?

Different opinions have existed in our country as to the right claimed by the Judiciary, of deciding upon the constitutionality of laws. The better opinion seems to be, that from the nature of our Government, and the very terms of the Constitution itself, by which that instrument is declared to be the supreme law of the land, the judges not only ought to exercise that power, but that they cannot avoid its exercise. If I am not mistaken, some gentlemen, who deny that the judges possess this right, are prepared to invest them with the more dangerous one of setting aside a Legislative act on the ground of corruption. To admit that the Judiciary may examine into the motives of the Legislature in passing laws, or that they may receive and decide upon evidence tending to prove corruption in the Legislative body, would certainly be going much farther than those have gone who have claimed for that department the right of deciding upon the constitutionality of laws. Suppose a trial of title between a person claiming under the act of Georgia, of 1795, and another claiming under the United States, and suppose evidence offered to the court to prove the corruption of the Legislature of Georgia, in what a peculiar situation would the judges be placed? And would they listen for a moment to an application for the admission of such evidence? It may well be doubted. Do not then the present claimants possess a very strong color of title? Is it not prudent to extinguish claims of this description?

Were claims, or the pretended claims of the present claimants, in any manner recognised by the act of cession of the territory in question from Georgia to the United States? And,

Do justice and policy, or either justice or policy, require that the whole or any part of the five millions of acres, reserved by the act of cession from Georgia to the United States, for the purpose of satisfying claims of a certain description against Georgia, in reference to the said territory, should be appropriated for the purpose of satisfying the claims of the present claimants?

I have anticipated the principal arguments in favor of the equity of the claims, and the policy of a compromise with the claimants. The memorialists state that their claims were particularly contemplated by the Commissioners, both of the United States and of Georgia. They have offered us no evidence of this fact, and we are not to take it for granted. Indeed, I am far from thinking it my duty either to advocate or answer the pamphlet of the memorialists, and I shall make but this single allusion to it. Whatever may be its merits, it has had no influence upon my mind in forming my opinion. An examination of the official documents upon our tables will evince, however, that by a very strong implication, if not by express provisions, these claims have been recognised, both by the act of cession, and by the law of Congress passed in consequence. The first condition of the first article of agreement and cession, provides for the payment of one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, to the State of Georgia, out of the first net proceeds of the sales of the lands then ceded: the second provides for certain British and Spanish grants: and the third is as follows:

"That all lands ceded by this agreement, to the United States, shall, after satisfying the above-mentioned payment of one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, to the State of Georgia, and the grants recognised by the preceding condition, be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States, Georgia included, and shall be faithfully disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever: provided, however, that the United States, for the period and until the end of one year after the assent of Georgia, to the boundary established by this agreement, shall have been declared, may, in such manner as not to interfere with the above-mentioned payment of the State of Georgia, nor with the grants herein before recognised, dispose of or appropriate a portion of the said lands, not exceeding five millions of acres, or the proceeds of said five millions of acres, or of any part thereof, for the purpose of satisfying, quieting, or compensating for any claims other than those herein before recognised, which may be made to the said lands, or to any part thereof. It being fully understood, that if an act of Congress making such disposition or appropriation shall not be passed into a law within the above-mentioned period of one year, the United States shall not be at liberty thereafter to cede any part of the said lands on account of claims which may be laid to the same, other than those recognised by the preceding condition, nor to compensate for the same; and in case of any such cession or compensation, the present cession of Georgia, to the right of soil over the lands thus ceded or compensated for, shall be considered as null and void, and the lands thus ceded or compensated for shall revert to the State of Georgia."

It is unnecessary to inquire into the motives which dictated a provision so singular; they are obvious to all who are acquainted with the whole history of the transaction. It was well understood that Congress was to pass the law, and it was passed on the third of March, 1803. The eighth section appropriated so much of the reserved five millions of acres as might be necessary to satisfy the claims not recognised by the preceding agreement, which were embraced by the two first sections of the act, or derived from British grants for lands not regranted by the Spanish Government; and it also contained the following appropriation: "So much of the residue of the said five millions of acres, or of the net proceeds thereof as may be necessary for that purpose, shall be, and is hereby, appropriated, for the purpose of satisfying, quieting, and compensating, for such other claims to the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee, not recognised in the above-mentioned articles of agreement, and which are derived from any act or pretended act of the State of Georgia, which Congress may hereafter think fit to provide for: Provided, however, That no other claims shall be embraced by this appropriation but those the evidence of which shall have, on or before the first day of January next, been exhibited by the claimants to the Secretary of State, and recorded in books to be kept in his office for that purpose, at the expense of the party exhibiting the same." The following are the opinions of the Commissioners, the Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, and Attorney General of the United States, upon this subject. On the claims pretended to be derived under the act of Georgia, of the 21st December, 1789, they observe: "Upon a full view of the subject, the Commissioners do not perceive that those companies have any equitable claim either for the land, or for compensation from the United States." Very different is their opinion upon the claims under the act of 1795: "The Commissioners think those propositions inadmissible, and without pretending to affirm that the Legislature of Georgia was competent to make the decision, they feel no hesitation in declaring it as their opinion, that under all the circumstances which may affect the case, as they have come within their knowledge, and as herein stated, the title of the claimants cannot be supported. But they nevertheless believe that the interest of the United States, the tranquillity of those who may hereafter inhabit that territory, and various equitable considerations, which may be urged in favor of most of the present claimants, render it expedient to enter into a compromise on reasonable terms." Here I cannot but remark, how very difficult it is for feeble minds to decide important questions upon which great men disagree. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) is of opinion that it would not only be impolitic to compromise these claims, but that the only claims of the applicants are fraud and villany; the Commissioners, who probably examined the subject with as much attention, at least with as much coolness, as that gentleman, believe that not only the public good requires the compromise, but that various equitable considerations may be urged in favor of most of the present claimants. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his letter of the 9th instant, to the chairman of the Committee of Claims, observes: "My own impression was, that the five millions of acres would be sufficient to cover all the claims of settlers, British grantees, and others not expressly provided for by the articles of agreement, and also to make a reasonable compensation for claims derived or pretended to be derived from Georgia; and it appeared to me that the effect of the clause would be—first, to prevent Congress from voluntarily confirming, at some future time, the said Georgia claims; second, to leave it in their power to compromise with that description of claimants, by allowing so much of the surplus of five millions of acres as they might think proper; without, at the same time, pledging Government to enter into a compromise, if, upon a full view of all the circumstances of the case, a different course was thought more eligible." The Committee of Claims, who must have paid more attention to the subject than it is possible for other members to do, "on considering these various transactions, are of opinion, that it is proper to make some legislative provision for the purpose of settling the existing claims on such terms as shall appear to be reasonable," and they recommend the appointment of Commissioners for that purpose. Can there any longer be a doubt that the claims are recognised by the act of cession? Can there be a doubt that Congress, by making the appropriation of the five millions of acres, and by subjecting the claimants to great expense in recording and supporting their claims, have tacitly pledged the public faith that some provision shall be made for them? And do not justice and policy require the adoption of the resolution reported by the committee?

The gentleman from Virginia has expressed his surprise that the chairman of the Committee of Claims has contented himself with reporting facts and principles, and that he has not adopted the novel procedure of reporting something tantamount to an elaborate speech in favor of the claims. As the speech of the gentleman from Virginia is unfortunately destitute of argument against the claims, and as it might be possible to deduce from it reasons in their favor, it might perhaps be proper for him to print it and annex it to the report, as a substitute for that which he thinks the chairman ought to have subjoined for the edification of the House. My feeble optics have been able to discover but one attempt at argument, which is in those observations which relate to the Message of the President, and the proceedings of Congress, on the act of Georgia, in 1795, and which it is contended, were notice, to purchasers and to the world, of fraud. At that time, it was not suspected that fraud had been committed, and the reason for those proceedings was, that the United States possessed, or were supposed to possess, certain claims to the territory. There are certain subtle, sublimated, ethereal, heaven-descended geniuses, the soft and silken texture of whose minds would suffer infinite discomposure from the contact of that rude and knotty thing—an argument. That gentleman is not of this description. Too often have we witnessed his argumentative powers to entertain this idea. I regret that he has declaimed instead of reasoning upon this occasion, as I believe that argument, particularly upon important subjects, is more useful than mere declamation. From motives which I cannot develop, for I ascribe improper views to no one, the present is attempted to be made a party question. The people are told that the Capitol has become a scene of political and private iniquity, of fraud and federalism; that the majority of their Representatives are committing a stupendous robbery upon the public patrimony, and their indignation is invoked upon the plunderers. What facts exist to justify these denunciations? Are we about to barter away the rights and interests of the people? Are we about to be guilty of a wanton waste of the public property? Are we guilty of political apostasy? No such thing. We are about to make arrangements for carrying into effect a solemn stipulation in the treaty with Georgia, and a solemn act of our predecessors, by devoting a part of the five millions of acres, specially reserved for that purpose, for which the United States never paid a cent, and never will pay a cent, to the extinguishment of the colorable claims of equitable claimants. Yet we are told that this act of equity, good faith, and good policy, is a stupendous crime, compared with which the flagitious acts of the former "unprincipled Administration" dwindle into "petty larcenies." I am a republican—a democratic republican. I was opposed to the general system of that Administration. But I do not think it magnanimous, or honorable, malignantly to triumph over fallen foes. Nor do I dread the union of honest men. It can be dreadful only to the dishonest.

It is said that the press is under the influence of a virtual sedition law. No, sir. The press—I speak without allusion to political distinctions—is incorrigibly licentious. Has the gentleman from Virginia read, in one of the oracles of our country, mingled with his own praises, the denunciation of the whole representation of one of the largest States in the Union (Massachusetts,) as composed of men destitute both of public and private integrity, and conspirators against the peace of the Union, merely because they differ in opinion from that gentleman upon this single question? Does he know that these denunciations are echoed and re-echoed, by means of the presses called exclusively republican, through almost every village of the nation? Has he heard that the Representatives of remote districts are denounced to their constituents as traitorous to their rights, and that their independence of his imperious mandates is made the powerful evidence of the treason? I hope, sir, that we shall never see the day when a private caucus of a few individuals shall be enabled to dictate to the people in whom to invest their confidence: and I also hope, that the day is not distant, when independence of sentiment, when independence even of party, shall be the surest passport to public confidence and public honors.

It is said that the circumstance that one of the great officers of the Government is numbered among the claimants, ought to scatter consternation through this House. It is unnecessary for me to undertake a vindication of the character of that gentleman. Does his office divest him of the common rights of a citizen? Does it deprive him of the right of petitioning the National Legislature? But his contracts are resorted to for the purpose of proving that he has extended his official influence within our walls. Unfortunate, indeed, is the application of this argument. By the report upon the table, it appears that three members are contractors, and we all see that two of them are opposed to the present claims.

Believing, Mr. Speaker, that this act of enormous robbery, this wanton dissipation of the public treasure, this abominable league between corruption and federalism, of which we hear so much, is neither more nor less than an act of just national policy; believing with the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the late Attorney General, that "the interest of the United States, the tranquillity of those who may hereafter inhabit that territory, and various equitable considerations, which may be urged in favor of most of the present claimants, render it expedient to enter into a compromise on reasonable terms;" and believing that this compromise ought to be delayed no longer, I shall give a decided vote in opposition to the proposed amendment, and in favor of the original resolution, as reported by the Committee of Claims.

Mr. LUCAS.—I am, sir, in favor of the amendment proposed to the report now under consideration. The unparalleled fraud which has been practised by the divers land companies styled purchasers, under the act or pretended act of Georgia of 1795, and by the Legislature that passed that act, have been fully noticed and exposed in the course of the debates which took place on the same subject, during the last session of Congress, and again during these two last days. This notorious fraud, odious as it is on the part of the land companies, is still much more so on the part of the members of the Legislature of Georgia, as their country had confided in them, and that themselves had pledged their faith under the obligation of an oath. But there are other instances of fraud and deception, materially affecting the purchase or claim in question, which have been solely practised by the land companies, and in which the Legislature of Georgia had no kind of participation. These charges cannot be resisted by the ordinary means of denial of facts, for they are supported upon authentic documents.

It ought to be observed that the four land companies who are original purchasers under the act of the Legislature of Georgia, passed on the 7th January, 1795, stated in their petition, containing their proposals to the Legislature to purchase certain lands belonging to the State of Georgia, that the land contained within the bounds which were described in their petition, amounted to 21,750,000 acres. It was evidently upon the faith of this statement, that the Legislature consented to sell that land for $500,000. However, it is now ascertained that the quantity of the land thus described amounts to 35,000,000 of acres, and the companies themselves compute it to be near 40,000,000. From this it appears evidently that the companies have deceived the Legislature by stating what was not true, that the contracts are legal and obligatory. The parties ought not only to have contracted with liberty of choice, but they ought also to have contracted with a due knowledge of the matter, which was the object of the contract. This has not been the case here; the Legislature has sold twice as much land as they intended to sell, or, which is the same thing, they have sold it one time cheaper than it was their intention, and all this loss is the result of the false statement given by the land companies.

It is an incontrovertible maxim of law, that none ought to be benefitted by his own wrongs; this maxim applies with a double force in a contract between the sovereign authority and private persons. The contract between the Legislature and the land companies having been entered into by the means of a statement which proves to be false, and which has been made by the parties that claim the benefit arising thereof, the contract becomes vitiated and of no effect.

Should this wrong not be sufficient to invalidate the contract, there is another wrong that would arise from it; by the act of 1795, a reserve was made of two millions of acres out of the several tracts sold to the Georgia land companies, for the use of such citizens of Georgia as chose to subscribe in the original terms of the purchase. The price paid by the citizens who did subscribe was two cents and one-third per acre, it being the price then supposed to have been paid by the companies, according to the statement originally made of the whole quantity of land contained in the purchase, which, as I have before said, proves to be very near double the land companies would receive from the citizens of Georgia; who clearly had a right to subscribe on the original terms;

a price per acre nearly double to that which they themselves would have to pay, and thus have a profit on the citizens of Georgia for the difference in the quantity of acres contained in the purchase arising from the false statement; which reduces, with respect to the speculators, the actual price of the land to little more than one cent per acre, while it remains at two cents and one-third with respect to the citizens of Georgia. However great may have been the departure of the Legislature of Georgia, from the interest of their constituents on this occasion, it appears evidently, that by the expression, "original term," they understand that their citizens should subscribe, if they chose, to the amount of two millions, upon terms similar to those of the land companies. It appears evidently they did believe they were selling the land of the State at the rate of two cents and one-third per acre, whilst, in fact, they received but one cent and one-sixth, which, upon the whole, is a consideration merely nominal.

To the multiplicity of the radical defects with which the title of the companies claiming under the act of 1795 abound, the advocates of the claim of the New England Mississippi Land Company answer, that none of those who compose their company had any participation in the fraud; they are said to be bona fide purchasers, perfectly ignorant of the fraud which may have been practised by those of whom they bought. They are represented in their memorial and vindication as plain farmers, mechanics, &c., who have made what they possess by the closest application and industry.

Sir, I stand among those who are the most ready to acknowledge that the inhabitants of New England are conspicuous for their industry; but I am likewise of opinion, that they are not less noted for their sagacity, in their attendance to their interest; and in the art of making good bargains, I view them as being fully competent to cope in dealings with the inhabitants of the Southern States. That they should not have heard of the notorious fraud which has taken place at the passing of the act of 1795, is a great cause of astonishment to me; that they should have made a purchase to the amount of eleven millions of acres, without making inquiries sufficient to discover what almost everybody knew throughout the United States, if possible, increases my astonishment. For my part, having never thought of purchasing any land from the Georgia land companies, I made no inquiry about the acts of the Legislature of Georgia; yet the corruption was so flagrant, the fraud so notorious, that it reached my ears soon after it was passed. A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) has justly observed, yesterday, that the President of the United States had, in his address to the two Houses of Congress, at the beginning of the session of 1795, taken a most direct notice of the act of Georgia, passed in January of the same year, as tending to dangerous consequences. Certainly such solemn communications of the first Magistrate, at the beginning of a session, contain matters that are an object of national concern, and generally sought for. There is not a paper in the Union that omits publishing those communications. It would be possible, however, that this communication would have escaped the notice of plain industrious farmers, such as are able, perhaps, to purchase two or three hundred acres of land; but that a company of sober and discreet speculators, and of New England, too, being about purchasing an immense quantity of land for a great sum of money, should be ignorant of what everybody knows, and of what they ought to know sooner than anybody else, is a circumstance too unaccountable and extraordinary for me to believe that it really exists. I should rather think that the speculators of New England, sober and discreet as they style themselves to be, found the bargain so good and so tempting, the means of pleading ignorance of fraud committed in the original purchase so easy, the means on the part of the State of Georgia, or its vendee, to prove the notice so difficult, that the sober and discreet speculators of New England thought it advisable to make a gambling bargain, expecting that the two extremities of the United States being engaged in the same speculation, they would combine their force and influence to press hard upon the centre, and save through the conflict their speculation, either in whole or in part. Other strong circumstances lead still more to believe, that the New England Company were well aware of the danger which did exist in making a purchase from the Georgia land companies; and that they were taking unusual risks upon themselves; this appears clearly from the face of their deeds; not only the covenant of warranty is special, instead of being general, but another extraordinary covenant is entered upon by which the Georgia Mississippi Company "is not liable to the refunding of any money in consequence of any defect in their title from the State of Georgia, if any such there should hereafter appear to be." Was not such covenant smelling strongly of the fraud which the Georgia grant was impregnated with? Could the New England Company take more clearly every risk upon themselves? Could they more expressly preclude themselves from every remedy in law or equity in case of eviction?

I shall forbear to advert any longer on the defects of the titles of the four Georgia companies and the New England company, claiming under the act of 1795. I shall only say that the fraud and collusion by the means of which these grants were obtained having operated a gradual defect, viz: a defect from the beginning, no legal transfer does exist by the first grant, and none of course can exist by the second purchase. My confidence in this opinion is much strengthened by that of three distinguished characters who have been appointed Commissioners, in pursuance of "An act, entitled an act for an amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia," &c. These Commissioners have said, in their report, a copy of which I now hold, "that they feel no hesitation in declaring it as their opinion that, under all the circumstances which may affect the case, as they have come within their knowledge and as herein stated, the title of the claimants cannot be supported," meaning the claimants under the act of Georgia of 1795. This opinion derives a great weight, not only from the high official standing, the known correctness, and abilities of these Commissioners, but, also, from the special trust which Congress has reposed in them to investigate those claims, and report on their merits. True it is that these Commissioners did express that, "nevertheless, they believe that the interest of the United States, the tranquillity of those who may hereafter inhabit that territory, and various equitable considerations, which may be urged in favor of most of the present claimants, render it expedient to enter into a compromise on reasonable terms;" when I am satisfied from my own opinion and that of the Commissioners "that the title of the claimants cannot be supported." I think that, on the question of expediency, there is no member of this House but that can form an opinion for himself; indeed, if this House did not act from their own ideas on this question, they need not to exercise their opinion upon anything at all. As to me, I cannot see any danger in not gratifying the cupidity of fraudulent purchasers with large quantities of land. I cannot consent to give away the property of the public to a very large amount, for the sake of humoring land companies and strengthening the nerve of speculation. Money is the bane of morals, when put in the hands of land speculators. Let us give them land or money, and we add to their means of seducing future legislatures. I view land speculators as a separate class of men, acting upon principles quite noxious to the rest of society. I view them as being intimately connected with one another, from one end of the continent to the other end. Their strength consists in a perfect combination of their influence; it is through that influence that any individual whose right clashes with their claims, must submit to their terms or lose all; it is a matter of course with land companies to monopolize lawyers, to have them at their command, to make them speak or be silent, as their interest requires.

While we are debating this great question, the land speculators within these walls or out of these walls are in a silent watch, anxiously waiting for the measures we are going to adopt; they appear at present quite modest and unassuming; but, let us throw in their hands five millions of acres of land, and the scene will soon be changed; their wealth, and the consequence attending it, will soon make us sensible of the advantages they will possess over us as individuals; and their children will, in a very little time, be taught to look with contempt upon ours; all the land companies will find new encouragement to rally round Congress from all quarters, and set forth their claims. We have land companies who claim almost all the lands which the United States have purchased on the year before last, from the Kaskaskia and Piankeshaw Indians. These companies, who style themselves the Illinois and Wabash Land Companies, have purchased for a valuable consideration, and without fraud; they have purchased before the Revolution, from Indians that had never surrendered to the Crown of Great Britain the right of pre-emption, from Indians who are out of the bounds of the original claim of the confederated Six Nations of Indians.

If we are to follow the doctrine laid down by a gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. ELLIOT,) which is that the Georgia land companies have, in the first instance, a color of title, and, in the second instance, a strong color of title, for which we ought to give them near five million acres of land, we may as well give as much to the Illinois Company, and again to the Wabash Company, for they also have a color of title, and a color, too, not darkened by fraud. We might, also, at the same rate, adjust and settle the claim of another long-leagued land company, who claim under an Indian grant, a tract of land adjoining the Falls of St. Anthony; for the Indians, under whom they claim, most probably have not acknowledged the sovereignty of the United States over their soil, and might be considered as not bound by the regulations of this country. Thus, land companies, by setting up claims to one hundred million acres of land, might modestly offer to surrender to the United States the nine-tenths of their claim, provided one-tenth part was secured to them by a compromise.

I would not do as a Representative in Congress what I could not do as an individual without blushing. Contracts, in my opinion, cannot be divided by ounces and pennyweights. The titles of the companies claiming under the act of Georgia of 1795, are good or bad; if they are good, Congress ought not to screw out of the hands of these companies the seven-eighths of their well-gotten property; if their titles are bad, Congress ought not to suffer them to have an eighth part of the public property.

Supposing that my neighbor had purchased a plantation, and that I knew well both the plantation and the vender: I would not by any means offer to purchase that same plantation from the original vender, unless I was well convinced that the former conveyance was a mere nullity, and then, should I purchase it, my honor and reputation would forbid me to compromise with the pretended vender contending against me, lest it should be thought that I had purchased what I knew my vender had legally conveyed before; lest it should be thought that I had made that purchase with the view of reserving a part of the benefits of the bargain of another: this being the true case which the United States are placed in, on the present occasion, the regard which I owe to their high dignity and interest, does not permit me to give my consent to a compromise.

Mr. Speaker, the agents of the New England Mississippi Company have attempted to prove in their vindication, page 30, that the sales of extensive tracts of vacant territory are not injurious to the interests of a nation; they have said that the State of New York has been settled under the patronage of landholders; they have said that Virginia, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, and Connecticut, are distinguished for the extent of their grants. I do not pretend to say that these States have escaped the calamities of land speculation; I will say, however, that those of them wherein land speculation did prevail the least are the most flourishing. Can it be said, indeed, that it is through the means of land speculation that these States have attained the advantages which they now enjoy? Their flourishing condition proves certainly the unconquerable spirit of industry and enterprise of their inhabitants; it proves that, notwithstanding the shackles of land monopoly and hard bargains, which was lying in the way of the yeomanry of those States, they have been able to reach, by hard and persevering toil, the comforts of life and independence. Who did clear that land and improve their farms but themselves? Who paid the price of the purchase of their lands but themselves? Was it necessary for their prosperity and that of their country, that they should pay eight or ten times more for the price of their land than they would if monopolizers had not stepped between them and the Government of their country? The same agents observe, also, page 30, that "in Pennsylvania a complete system existed, which, to be sure, has produced embarrassments equally pernicious and distressing to the settler and the landholder." I suppose that the agents allude to the sale of the unappropriated lands of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, under the act of April, 1792, situate north and northwest of the rivers Ohio, &c.; however, I beg leave to say, that they are mistaken in giving the system as the cause of the embarrassments; the system was no more complex than what was absolutely necessary to provide for the accommodation of two classes of persons, to wit: Those to whom it was more convenient to give money in the first place, and labor after; and those that could better afford labor at first, and money after; each class had their respective mode of commencing and completing their titles clearly devised. The consequence resulting from their neglect to perform certain conditions, were amply provided for; a partition sufficient to prevent the rights of such persons as the law contemplated from interfering or clashing had been erected. But this partition has been partly thrown down by the irresistible force of divers land companies combined together. I shall not relate, at this moment, the vexations and sufferings which the industrious and inoffensive actual settlers of Pennsylvania have borne and are daily experiencing from several land companies. I shall only say, that the wolves have made a dreadful havoc among the lambs.

Again, I cannot believe that it is good policy to give away an immense property; nay, I believe it to be more dangerous to give it to a few families. The idea of grantees of large tracts of land, brings always to my recollection a multiplicity of other persons without lands and without means of independence. When I look at a castle in Europe, I directly think of the wretched and degraded tenantry, toiling hard to satisfy the luxuries of the proud idler who lives in it.

The extreme of wealth and poverty mostly operates two evils; and these evils become still greater in a Republic than anywhere else. Was it not for the landed property being held by a few in Ireland, and were not the three fourths of the people of that country tenants at will, their well known energy and spirit would have enabled them long ago to effect a revolution and ameliorate their fate.

Mr. BOYD.—The question before the House is not whether we are to do a good or an injury to the class of men who are denounced as a band of speculators; but it is whether we shall agree to or reject the amendment to the resolution offered yesterday to the House by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. CLARK.) Yesterday was taken up in reading the laws of Georgia, and of the United States, and various other papers, which have been long in the hands of the members, and which no doubt had been so attentively perused by them as to have rendered the reading at this day not indispensably requisite. Mr. B. said, that if papers were to be read for the instruction and edification of the members as to well-known facts, he thought it would have been of more consequence to have read the Declaration of Independence, and the Treaty of Peace of 1783, in which the independence of the United States was acknowledged by the only Power on earth who contended against it. We were then free, sovereign, and independent States, to all intents and purposes, and as sovereign States, each and every State in the Union had full power and authority to dispose of their lands to whom they pleased, and under what conditions they pleased. And if the State of Georgia, in the exercise of her sovereignty, have conveyed to the Mississippi Land Company the right of soil to the land in question, and that Company have transferred the same to the New England Mississippi Land Company, the right is vested in them; unless we have arrived at that stage of political depravity that what was yesterday acknowledged as a right shall to-morrow be declared a wrong.

Why is it that speculators are so much reproached, when we ourselves have become speculators to an extent beyond the aggregate of the land speculations in the United States of America? Has not Congress recently speculated in the purchase of Louisiana, and paid the price, and will gentlemen contend here, as if they mean to be confident they might do, that we have acquired no right to the same because we purchased of France, who had no right to sell, as its Government holds all its powers for the good of the people, and that it is not for the good of the French people that their territories should be alienated from them? Does it follow that when a nation has vested in another its rights of soil and jurisdiction, that the investiture does not hold good without inquiry into the purity of the motives of the contracting parties? Will you, then, prevent men from putting their reliance and confidence in the State Legislatures?

It is asked why, if they have a right to the lands in Georgia which they claim, why do they propose to relinquish to the United States nine-tenths of their claim? It would be a sufficient answer to that question to say, that Congress is the only power possessing the right to extinguish the Indian title to the country, and if Georgia had possessed that right he apprehended the present claimants would have been suffered to go on and improve their farms in that district; they never would have been disturbed in their possession. He was not in favor of speculators, but he had made up his mind never to lay his hand violently upon the claim of any man, more than he would a man's property when he was in full and quiet possession. Nor should he pretend to instruct others in the disposal of their money, persuaded that every man had a right to lay his money out in such way as was most agreeable to himself, and of which he was the best judge.

We are asked, who dare vote for squandering the public money in this wholesale manner? This is my declaration in reply: I dare to vote for the measure proposed by the Committee of Claims. Nay, further, I am bound to vote in its favor. It is my duty so to vote, for I have sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and that Constitution declares that no State shall make any ex post facto law, or law impairing contracts. But why do gentlemen dwell so much upon speculators? The act of Congress to obtain the cession of her Western territory from the State of Georgia, is a speculation upon the speculators who purchased the right of soil to the Mississippi Territory.

I do not inquire whether Georgia sold her land in small tracts or in large districts; nor whether she sold the land to individuals or companies—numbers and quantities I lay out of the question, and confine myself merely to the inquiry, did she sell; and finding that she did sell, and that for a valuable consideration, my mind rests satisfied, and I am compelled to render that justice which the annulling act of Georgia refused. Nay, the price itself does not enter into my contemplation, circumstances may alter the relative value of the price to the article. Will any gentleman say that the price at which Congress have sold their lands to the great purchasers, such as Symmes and others, is a cause to justify our setting those sales aside? I apprehend not. Why, then, do they measure by a different standard in the case of Georgia?

Georgia under the old regime was what was called a King's government; the right of jurisdiction was given up to her exercise from the first—the right of soil remained in the Crown. But when we acquired our independence, Georgia took possession, which she was justifiable in doing, of the soil as well as the sovereignty, and thus being possessed of both, it was competent for her Legislature to dispose of the vacant land; and no subsequent Legislature could constitutionally say it avails not, and it shall not hold. I am not ashamed of this opinion; on the contrary, it is corroborated by the practice of all the States in the Union. A grant of land by the Legislature is universally held sacred. It is so under the Government of the United States also, yet neither the State Legislatures are all the citizens of the State, nor are Congress all the citizens of the United States, which, according to the doctrine we have heard advanced, are requisite to complete the contract. This being the case, I will not vote for the amendment; it goes to destroy the right which the petitioners have to the reserved fund of five millions of acres; it goes to defeat and overturn a well-established security which the people have for landed property. I will not vote for it, because I do not believe that Congress have a divine right to do wrong. Mr. B. said, if all the speculators were scouted from these walls, he did not know who would remain. He had no quarrel with them about the question, but he should ever contend that every man had a right to pursue his object in his own way; the right grew out of the moral compact agreed to as fundamental in every established and well-regulated society.

Mr. CLARK said he was still in favor of the amendment on the table, and which he yesterday had the honor of submitting. He did not wish it to be understood that the amendment was intended to give a preference to any description of claims under the different acts of the State of Georgia, and provided for by the general resolution, but intended it should meet directly those which have excited the most public attention, have been the most ardently pursued, the most zealously advocated, and attended with the most extraordinary circumstances. If the facts which have accompanied this monstrous business from its origin to the present moment were publicly known, or if it could be retraced through all its cunning and wily mazes, the claims would sink beneath the weight of honest indignation, and instead of now being urged before the Congress of the United States, would be gladly withdrawn from public view, and buried in perpetual silence. He peculiarly wished on this occasion a cool and temperate discussion, to divest ourselves of all feelings either of improper compassion or prejudice, that equally tend to inflame the heart and mislead the judgment. It should be his humble province to endeavor a fair investigation of the naked question, disrobing it of those tinsel habiliments which have been artfully thrown around it for the purpose of concealing its real deformity.

The claims the amendment goes to reject, are derived by a pretended law of the State of Georgia, said to have been passed in the month of January, 1795. He would contend this law was absolutely void, ab initio, not only because the Legislature had no power to make such a law, but from the circumstances under which it was made. That the grantees under this law could have no title to the land, either legal or equitable, and that there has been no circumstances attending the subsequent sales, that place the sub-purchasers under superior equitable advantages. It will be particularly necessary, Mr. Speaker, to be attentive to dates; that of the law under which the claims are made, and generally known by the name of the "cession law," has already been noticed. Let us now see how this law passed. It stands characterized by circumstances unparalleled in the annals of pollution—of which, we have the most conclusive evidence before us. The whole State of Georgia has borne testimony to the fact, and it is now deposited in the archives of the Government, that, a majority of the Assembly which passed the law were corrupted and bribed. Some had money given them; others, shares in the lands they were effecting the sale of. This is so universally admitted and detested, that the most enthusiastic friends of the present claimants cheerfully allow the original grantees had no titles, and he believed there was not one now before Congress with his claim. But it is contended the sub-purchasers had no notice of the fraud in the original contract, but are bona fide purchasers for a good and valuable consideration actually paid. This he never could agree to. The evidence before him was the contrary, and he would here take a review of at least a part of that evidence, a great portion of which, no doubt, has been destroyed by the lapse of nine years, but a sufficiency remains when brought together, irresistibly to carry conviction to the mind of the most skeptical. The law itself is almost enough for this purpose. The simple object was to sell to four companies the vacant western land; but to delude the people and lull inquiry, it is called "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'an act for appropriating a part of the unlocated territory of this State, and for the payment of the State troops, and for other purposes, and the protection and support of the frontier,'" and the same fascination is kept up through the enacting clauses, and it is the longest act in the statute book. It goes into a lengthy examination of the State title, of extinguishing the Indian title, and appropriating the money, directing it to be laid out in bank stock. Where, Mr. Speaker, will you find such a law as this? If the object of the Legislature had been correct, would there have been a necessity for clothing the law in such delusive colors? No sir! fraud and infamy were to be cancelled, and the covering must be thick. They were, however, disappointed in their aim, for honesty and integrity had yet their residence in the State, and as soon as it was known, the whole country was feelingly alive to the abuse, and a general effervescence pervaded the public mind; this was manifested in the only possible way that remained. The Assembly had adjourned, not to meet again in a twelvemonth. Presentments of the grand juries, in almost all the counties of the State, were made in terms of bitter disapprobation of the law. It was also denounced in the public prints, from one end of the continent to the other. In the month of May, 1795, a convention was held in the State; the grand jury presentments, petitions, and remonstrances from all parts of the country were sent up; these were, by the convention, remitted to the next Legislature as the only competent authority to remedy so enormous an evil. In the month of February before, as has been so ably stated by my valued friend and colleague, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) had this subject been the substance of a communication of the President of the United States to Congress, and a resolution and a bill passed the House of Representatives on the subject. Shall I, after this, be told the sub-purchasers had no notice? Impossible; no historical event so notorious. But the evidence does not stop here. The Georgia Legislature again assembled in the month of November, 1795. The subject of this nefarious and wicked speculation, that covered the country with shame and disgrace, was taken up, and if a doubt had remained of the corruption, it was then removed by a number of affidavits proving incontestably the fact; and on the thirteenth day of February, 1796, a law was passed, not repealing the act of 1795, but with honest and laudable indignation declaring it null and void, as being bottomed upon fraud and perjury, and unveiling to the world the most flagitious conduct that ever disgraced a Legislative assembly. It is there ascertained and declared, that the land had been sold for three hundred thousand dollars less than what had been offered for it, and the quantity of land much greater than it had been represented. The lands contained in the grants to the four companies were estimated at twenty-one millions of acres, which at five hundred thousand dollars, the price given, is twelve and a half cents per acre; the real quantity is about thirty-five millions of acres; this reduces the price of the garden of the world to nearly one and one-third cents the acre. Take notice, Mr. Speaker, that the law of 1796 does not pretend to repeal the act of 1795, but proclaims, to everybody, that to be void which was in reality so before, and with an honest zeal provides that the money which had been paid should be repaid to the purchaser. This annulling law was so precious to the people, it was a monument so honorable to the State, that when afterwards the citizens of that State arose in the majesty of their strength, resuming all those rights, and acted in convention, this very law was ingrafted in their Constitution.

Here the general evidence ends; and is there yet a remaining hesitation about the proof of notice? To such infidelity the glare of meridian light will not be convincing.

The advocates for the claimants have chosen their ground with great address. If they cannot be supported upon principles of law and equity, they adroitly change their position and take the more defensible stand of policy; but even the ramparts here raised will moulder away and fall to the ground at the conquering touch of truth. Can it be good policy to do what is wrong? Shall virtue and integrity, the foundation of our Government, the pillars, the Boaz and Jachin of the temple, be thrown down and trampled under foot? Shall justice be driven weeping from our walls, and vice and corruption here rear their heinous heads? Forbid it reason, forbid it God! But they have high authority on their side. The commissioners who made the articles of agreement and cession with the State of Georgia recommended it; so they did; but I ask you under what circumstances? In the report they made on this subject, and containing this recommendation, they expressly stated the facts which I have just detailed, and concluded by declaring that "under all circumstances which may affect the case and had come to their knowledge, the claimants could not support their title." Upon what data therefore has this compromise been recommended? As great as those gentlemen may be, and as illustrious as is their characters and services to their country, and as great as is my regard—and in this article I yield to no man—yet it is incomprehensible upon what principles such a conclusion is drawn from such premises. The claimants have no title, yet they ought to be provided for; they have cheated the Government, and therefore ought to be rewarded; they have prostrated the fairest of the social virtues, but they are entitled then to compensation; they have acted with the most unbounded profligacy and immorality, nevertheless, they must be noticed and encouraged; they have speculated, therefore must have money. Is this House prepared to assent to such reasoning, and to accept such a system of policy? A man to entitle himself to justice, ought to have clean hands and a pure heart. With a very ill grace does he ask for equity, with bribery in his hands and perjury and corruption in his heart; and shall a horde of speculators be the peculiar objects of Congressional bounty? Shall they be the selected and chosen few whose magnanimity and virtue shall be rewarded with unbounded wealth?

Permit me now, Mr. Speaker, after having said so much upon the general question, to examine it more minutely and in detail. One particular case before us deserves peculiar attention; it is that known formerly by the name of the Georgia Mississippi Company, now the New England Mississippi Company. Too well known in its old jockey dress, it has changed its livery, and after having been driven from the sporting fields of the South, it has taken up its residence in the East, as the theatre of its future career. The agents for this company have written a large pamphlet in vindication of their claim, and every member has been furnished with a copy as an entertainment for his evening's leisure, and pious employment of his Sabbath's holiday. In this book it is stated that the New England Company finished the contract and took a deed from the Georgia Company on the 13th day of February 1796. This is the very day the annulling law received the Executive sanction in the State of Georgia; a wonderful coincidence of circumstances; it seems almost providential: but how different the employment—the Assembly of Georgia completing an act, the proudest boast of their political life, which posterity will praise and admire, while the New England Company were planning cunning and extensive schemes of speculation, and which, we are told, have been but too successful in their effects—that the widows and orphans of men of wealth are now chewing the crust of poverty from this accursed business. This is the melancholy effect of this baneful influence of speculation; and we are called upon to minister to the very passion, and by our imputed righteousness to expiate the sins of this ruinous, vile, and destructive transaction; and that we shall, by sanctifying their claims, fix a stigma on that glorious monument of Georgian honesty, the annulling law. But, to return, will these people after these things tell us they are innocent purchasers without notice for a valuable consideration, bona fide paid? Yes, they have told us so, and told us too by lawyers; for of this description are their agents; and who have admitted that it is not necessary to prove positive notice, a constructive one being sufficient. Where did these people reside? In the town of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts. Are they ignorant? No, they are the best informed men in the State, and most of them public characters, and yet had no knowledge of what was passing in the State of Georgia, or in Congress, which then sat at Philadelphia. The newspapers of the South could not penetrate the frozen regions of the North, yet the polluted laws of Georgia could travel there. Permit me modestly to ask the agents, who are professional gentlemen, if the company, upon the most correct construction of the doctrine, were not pendente lite purchasers? did they not buy a lawsuit, and ought they not to abide the decision? The Legislature of Georgia convened in the month of November, 1795, and immediately took up the subject, and on the very day of the decision is the deed made to the purchasers; was not, therefore, the case pending when the purchase was made? If I am asked, how could people in Boston know what the Assembly of Georgia were doing? I answer that the purchaser ought to take care the doctrine of latent equity, so much relied upon by the claimants, does not apply here as in individual cases. If a man has an equity which he does not assert, and an honest purchaser interposes it, he is supposed guilty of negligence, by which a third person may be injured, and, therefore, he is not permitted to disturb the honest purchaser, for the best of all reasons, that when one of two innocent persons must suffer, it ought to be him whose act permitted the injury. But suppose a suit had been commenced against the first grantees in the State of Georgia, in a court of common jurisprudence; as early as November, and on the 13th day of the next February it was determined against the grantees, and the patent ordered to be cancelled, would not the purchasers in Boston be bound by it? No legal gentleman may controvert this position. The people of Georgia did more than this. It is true they did not institute a suit, because there was no possible way in which this could be done. No court of competent jurisdiction in which the ordinary process of law could be carried on, and redress afforded, existed; the injury was grievous and sensibly felt; the representatives of the people had violated the most sacred trust, and had justly doomed themselves to their severest vengeance. The case being sui generis, all that could be done was immediately accomplished. The grand juries presented, and the people generally petitioned and remonstrated; it was canvassed in every company, and the topic of universal conversation, at least in that part of the country; these circumstances could not have been unknown to the purchasers. One more circumstance on this head, and which he had nearly forgotten: the President's communication was made in February, 1795; on the third of March following, Congress rose and the Senators and Representatives returned to their respective States with a full knowledge of this wicked transaction, and it would be doing great injustice to suppose they were silent on this important subject. Let the House determine this question by each member asking himself if he did not know it, and on the answer, he would with certainty rely. Should he be told that even all this is not positive proof of notice, in answer, he would assert that it is a mass of testimony strong and invincible, and such as is seldom produced in courts of justice; an unbroken chain of evidence, that infidelity itself cannot resist; nothing but a mistaken tenderness for these unworthy speculations can turn the mind aside from the path of truth and justice.

On this subject he would add but one more remark: if all that has been mentioned shall fall short of positive notice, have not these people been guilty of culpable negligence, unaccountable and even criminal remissness. The sources of information were numerous, and the means of information easy and convenient, the contract an important one; they were about to purchase a tract of country nearly as large as the State they lived in; and was it an evidence of simple honesty and prudence to proceed thus precipitantly? Is it customary for men—men, too, remarkable for their quicksightedness, to act with such unguarded temerity? We must leave this ground before we can reconcile the conduct of the purchasers under any reasonable and rational principles of human action; there is one, and only one, on which all these strange things are reconcilable—speculation. Yes, sir, this was the moving cause, the primum mobile, the grand desideratum. Gain and loss employed the whole of their attention; they had their data before them, they knew the circumstances, and calculated their chances, and adventured in the game of hazard; and because they have been unsuccessful, our ears are stunned with the yell of lamentation.

Mr. Speaker, law has been dragooned to the support of these claims, judicial authorities have been cited, and decisions in equity quoted. Yes, unhallowed hands, and polluted hearts, have ventured to approach the pure temple of justice. A book on which the claimants very much rely, I now hold in my hand. I acknowledge it of high authority, from the sacred equity and immutable principles of justice, on which the decisions are founded. Powell on Contracts is the book; in the 221st page of the second book, is a correct and general description given to the qualifications of a contract necessary to engage the interposition of a court of equity, and it must be again repeated, the claimants are the applicants. "It must be fair, just, reasonable, bona fide, certain 'in all its parts, mutual, useful, made upon a good 'and valuable consideration, not merely voluntary, consistent with the general policy of a well 'regulated society, and free from fraud, circum- 'vention, or surprise."

JANUARY, 1805.

Georgia Claims.

H. OF R.

Under these general rules it has been uniformly and invariably decided, that a contract wanting any of these constituent parts, will be set aside in a court of equity; that is, if it be not bona fide, and it must not only be so between the contracting parties, but it must not be mala fide with respect to others. Fraud has in all well organized societies, and systems of jurisprudence, with which he had any acquaintance, been considered as a sufficient ground to destroy a bargain; it is just and proper it should be so, otherwise what is considered as immoral and detestable in private life, would receive the sanction of a publicly recognised principle, having its foundation in impurity. So far have the conscience of courts of equity gone, that contracts, though fair in themselves, yet, if they had a fraudulent object in view, were set aside; and no rule is more generally received and better established than that contracts made with a view to cheat the Government are void both in law and equity. Here let me pause, and emphatically ask gentlemen, upon what principle of law or equity can these claims be maintained. This Government has never in the most remote degree recognised them or guaranteed the title, and what is not a little surprising, the best informed gentlemen on judicial subjects on the other side of the House, are profoundly silent. If the claims could be maintained by reason, argument, law, or justice, would they be satisfied by the silent eloquence of a still vote? This House and their country have something to expect from them, why therefore are they mute? Conscience whispers—management and policy command this silence. He frankly acknowledged it was not competent to him, it was not his wish or design to speak of motives; it would be uncharitable, highly unbecoming, and greatly indiscreet; what he had never been in the habit of doing, and hoped never should do. Every member on this floor, and himself with the rest, had to answer to his country, his conscience, and his God, for his conduct, and he would now solemnly declare, that as greatly as he disapproved the measures of the former Administration, he would rather vote for every one than for the resolution reported by the committee.

MR. EUSTIS.—If the position taken by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. CLARK) could be established, it would not in my opinion justify the amendment which he has proposed to the resolution under consideration; because the amendment renders the resolution null and void, and the resolution neither affirms nor admits the legal title. Still, I should be willing to rest the whole merits of the case on the single question, whether the claimants, at the time of making their purchases, had or had not a knowledge of the fraud? In the autumn of 1795, when the sales were generally made in New England, there was no knowledge or suspicion of fraud—the contracts were made in full confidence of the act of a sovereign and independent State—and I know they could have had no knowledge of any fraud in the Legislature of Georgia. We are told by the gentleman that there was “a great uproar throughout the State of Georgia.”

Whatever might have been the nature or extent of this uproar, I am confident that a knowledge of it had not reached New England at the time the contracts were made. But the proof that there was no knowledge of any fraud depends not on the opinions or assertions of individuals—it is founded on a circumstance which removes all doubt on the subject—it is founded on the price which the purchasers paid for the land. They paid, as they have stated in their memorial, as much per acre for these lands as the State of Massachusetts had received, a few years before, for lands lying in the State of New York. And is it probable that the purchasers who have been represented by a gentleman from Pennsylvania as possessing so much sagacity, and looking so well to their own interests, would have paid or contracted to pay such a price, with a knowledge that the original grant had been fraudulently obtained?

It is also contended, by the same gentleman, that the claimants had knowledge of the rescinding act of 1796. This was impossible in points of time. The sales were generally made in 1795—the rescinding act was passed in January, 1796. It follows, then, that they were innocent purchasers, without knowledge of the fraud or of the rescinding act. Two objections have been made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and relied on by the gentleman from Virginia: The first is, that “the original grantees purchased nominally twenty millions of acres, when it appeared that forty millions were contained within their metes and bounds.” This was a transaction between the original grantees and the Legislature of Georgia, in which the present claimants had no agency, and for which they are not responsible. The second objection is said to be found in the deeds of the claimants, where it is contended they have furnished evidence against themselves, in the following words: “And, lastly, it is covenanted and expressly agreed and understood, by and between the parties to these presents, that neither the grantees aforesaid, nor their heirs, executors, or administrators, shall be held to any further or other warrantee than is herein expressed, nor liable to the refunding any money in consequence of any defect in their title from the State of Georgia, if such there should hereafter appear to be.” This, it is contended, is an acknowledgment on the part of the claimants of a defective title. Let us now turn to the act of Georgia of 1795, under which the original title was derived. We there find a clause in the following words: “And provided, further, that this State and the government thereof shall at no time hereafter be subject to any suit at law, or in equity, or claim, or pretension, whatever, for or on account of any deduction in the quantity of the said territory, or on account of the amount of the purchase-money to be paid as aforesaid, by any recovery which may or shall be had on any former or other claim or claims whatever.”

The two sections correspond, in a great degree. The first, instead of a suspicion of any fraud, or a doubt of their title, confirms the opinion which was entertained by the claimants of the validity of their title, and their confidence in the act of Georgia.

H. of R.

Georgia Claims.

It is further contended that the petitioners have no equitable claim on the Government. If this be true, the resolution ought not to be adopted. The equity of the claims depends on a fact admitted on all hands—on the fact that they have purchased the lands, and paid a valuable consideration for the same. This constitutes the essence of the claim, and has produced the resolution now before the House. The legality of the claims is not under consideration. The legality of the claims can only be decided by the courts of law, where the title to the whole of the land would be established or set aside. If the title should be established and confirmed, the United States would have no right to possess or dispose of any part of it, although they have contracted to pay the State of Georgia $1,200,000, and to extinguish the Indian title to their lands.

The resolution proposes an equitable compromise and settlement, and that the claimants shall be compensated out of the residue of the five millions, or the proceeds thereof, which have been reserved for this purpose in the third article of the agreement and cession, by which the whole of the territory was ceded by the State of Georgia to the United States.

When the State of Georgia was about making the cession, the claimants appeared and entered their caveat to the Commissioners of the United States against their accepting the cession, for that they had purchased and paid a valuable consideration for the territory. Proposals of compromise were also made to the Commissioners by the claimants. In a correspondence which took place on that occasion, the title of the claimants and the proposals made by them were declared to be inadmissible by the Commissioners; they proceeded to accept the deed of cession of Georgia, informing the claimants at the same time that a reservation would be made, from which it was their intention that they should be reimbursed the moneys actually paid by them. The reservation in the third article was accordingly made, in the following words: "Provided, however, that the United States, for the period and until the end of one year after the assent of Georgia to the boundary established by this agreement shall have been declared, may, in such manner as not to interfere with the above-mentioned payment to the State of Georgia, nor with the grants hereinbefore recognised, dispose of or appropriate a portion of the said lands, not exceeding five millions of acres, or the proceeds of five millions of acres, or of any part thereof, for the purpose of satisfying, quieting or compensating any claims other than those hereinbefore recognised, which may be made to the said lands or to any part thereof."

In conformity with this provision, an act was passed making the appropriation, and appointing Commissioners to receive propositions of compromise and settlement, and requiring the registering the claims in the office of State. The time for registering the claims was afterwards prolonged; and during the present session a resolution has been offered by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. CLARK) still further to prolong the time. The Commissioners proceeded to receive propositions from the claimants, and after determining that their propositions were inadmissible, they offer their opinion, in the following words: "But they nevertheless believe that the interest of the United States, the tranquillity of those who may hereafter inhabit that territory, and various equitable considerations which may be urged in favor of most of the present claimants, render it expedient to enter into a compromise on reasonable terms."

Without the habit of placing implicit confidence in the opinion of others, I must confess that this opinion of three gentlemen appointed by the Government, who have examined the whole subject, who have devoted much of their time to it, and who must be supposed to be well acquainted with the nature and merits of the claims, has some influence on my mind. They knew that many of the claimants had advanced large sums of money, which in their opinion constituted an equitable title, and they believed that the interest of the United States required an amicable and reasonable adjustment. And what is the purport of the resolution? Does it contemplate the laying any tax or burden on the whole or on any part of the people? It does not. Does it propose that all the claimants shall be paid or compensated to the extent of their demands? No. It refers all the claims to Commissioners to be appointed by the Government for examination, and such award as their respective merits may entitle them to receive. And out of what fund is the compensation to be made? Out of the residue of the five millions of acres—out of the fund which appears to have been reserved for that purpose.

On the subject of advances actually made, I beg leave to mention a single instance. A judgment was obtained in the supreme court of Massachusetts against an individual in a sum of upwards of $80,000, on a bond given for these lands, for payment of which his estate is mortgaged. This gentleman has paid the tribute to nature—his widow and orphan children are represented in one of the petitions. By the judgment of the court he is held to pay. If a suit should be instituted for the recovery of the land, and it should be determined there is no legal title, where is the remedy? In the case of the corrupt act of the State of Georgia, it has been contended there ought to have been a remedy somewhere, and the State of Georgia sought a remedy in the rescinding act of 1796. In the present instance, I trust it will be found in the justice and good faith of this Government.

THURSDAY, January 31.

On a motion made, and leave given by the House,

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee appointed, the twelfth of November last, on so much of the Message of the President of the United States, as relates "to the defence and security of our ports and harbors, and supporting within our waters the authority of the laws," reported a bill to appropriate a sum of money for the purpose of building gun-boats; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

ALIEN CREDITORS.

Mr. CLOPTON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the twenty-first ultimo, the petition of sundry British merchants and others, subjects of His Britannic Majesty, within the United States, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next. The report is as follows:

The committee, to whom was referred the petition of sundry British merchants and other subjects of His Britannic Majesty, submit the following report:

The object of this petition is to procure an act for extending the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, so that the said courts shall have cognizance of "all cases arising under treaties," and of controversies in which an alien is a party, without restriction as to sum, though the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, should be under the sum or value of $500; or that some other competent tribunal to take cognizance of such causes be established under the authority of the United States.

The petitioners ground their application to the Legislature on the following authorities, viz:

The second section of the third article of the Constitution of the United States, which establishes the judicial power of the United States.

The fourth article of the definitive treaty of peace between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, wherein "it is agreed that creditors on either side shall meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of the full value in sterling money of all bona fide debts heretofore contracted."

And the second article of the convention made the eighth day of January 1802, which recognises and confirms the said fourth article of the definitive treaty.

As reasons for making this application, in support of which they have presented a view of the section of the Constitution and the articles of the treaty and convention which have been recited, the petitioners allege, "that a number of small debts are due from individuals widely dispersed throughout the State of Virginia, to British creditors, contracted before the peace of 1783; and that, for want of a tribunal whose jurisdiction shall embrace debts of a smaller magnitude than $500, they and their agents are exposed to much trouble, incur an heavy expense, and, frequently, with the eventual and entire loss of debts, supported by such documents and principles as have, in a number of similar cases, insured them a recovery in the federal circuit courts. That the inferior, and some of the superior, courts of the Commonwealth, are not influenced by any uniform course of decision, so that claims resting upon precisely the same principles of law and evidence, receive different decisions in the different courts; and that these courts do not in practice respect the decisions of the circuit court and the Supreme Court of the United States, on the construction of the said 4th article of the British Treaty, in relation to British debts."

The committee deem it their duty first to consider whether such a provision as that which is solicited by the petitioners, be expeditious and proper, as a general regulation, before they inquire how far the special cases alluded to in the petition, have a claim to the measure. As connected with this view of the subject, a principle of the Federal Constitution presents itself, which is believed to merit serious attention. It is to be remarked that, in the formation of this Constitution, it appears to have been a fundamental principle of great and leading influence, that the powers of the General Government should be so apportioned as not to produce any unnecessary diminution in the powers of the State Governments. In conformity with this principle, the powers originally appertaining to those governments, are left in their possession; except those by the exercise of which the general purposes of the Union might be contravened; they are therefore delegated to the Federal Government. This principle strongly characterises the distribution of the legislative power, and it is to be traced in that part of the Constitution which prescribes the limits of judicial power; although, in assigning to that power the objects of its jurisdiction, the principle does not operate so extensively as it does in assigning to the legislative power the object of its jurisdiction. We find that the judicial power does not extend to controversies between citizens of the same State, except in the particular cases where lands are claimed under grants of different States, and obvious is the reason. The State courts, as they always were, so are they still, equally competent to the cognizance of, and a due administration of justice in, all such cases, while they are more convenient to the parties litigant. A transfer of jurisdiction to the federal courts in these cases would unnecessarily diminish the authority of the States, and is not necessary to the purposes of the Union; it remains, therefore, exclusively vested in the State courts. We find that the power does extend to controversies between citizens of different States; but here the jurisdiction is not exclusively vested in the Federal Government; in the exercise of it this Government only participates with the State governments. So far, however, as this concurrent jurisdiction is actually exercised, the sphere of State authority is contracted. This authority dwindles and shrinks into narrower limits, as such jurisdiction descends lower in the scale of controversies, embracing in its descent a great variety of cases. Thus the increment of Federal authority produces a proportionate decrease of State authority. To extend this process farther than a due administration of justice requires, is to deviate from an important fundamental principles of the Constitution.

It is presumable that, inasmuch as the Federal Government was instituted for the benefit of every citizen within the United States, this concurrence of jurisdiction, in the case last recited, might have been considered as one of the purposes proper to be provided for in this system; that a citizen of one State having a matter of controversy within the territorial limits of another State, and with a citizen of that State, might take his option of resorting either to the State or to the Federal tribunal for its adjustment and decision. A similar consideration might have induced the extension of jurisdiction to the Federal tribunal, in controversies between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States. In cases of this description, the extension might have been as strongly recommended on the ground of convenience to the parties, as in ordinary controversies between citizens of different States.

Yet, while regard is thus had to the convenience of those who, residing in one State, have to prosecute in another State, the convenience of the parties on the other side ought not to be entirely neglected; equal attention is due to each, and the Legislature will respect both alike in the arrangements it makes towards carrying the power into execution. If citizens of one State are entitled, from the nature and general design of the Government, to draw those of another State before the Federal tribunal in matters of controversy between them, it is believed to be a question of no inconsiderable moment how far a provision for that purpose may be extended, without operating a greater inconvenience on the one side, than any rightful claim to such provision on the other side would justify. This question involves an estimate of the degree of interest which may constitute a proper subject of controversy between the parties litigant before such tribunal. It is believed that, in making this estimate, the just rule of calculation is deduced from the following considerations, viz:

The inconveniences to which the parties on one side will generally be subjected from attendance on a single court, sitting at one particular place in the State, contrasted with the situations of the State courts, so numerous and so dispersed, that almost every man finds one convenient to him; and the excess of costs and charges incident to prosecutions in the former, beyond those which are incurred from prosecutions in the latter courts.

From this view of the question, which presents itself to the Committee as a correct one, their impressions are, that matters of controversy between citizens of different States, which do not involve a very inconsiderable interest to the parties, ought not to be subjected to the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States; that, where the interest involved is considerable, a provision extending their jurisdiction to such cases might operate a degree of oppression to the parties on one side, while those on the other side could derive no greater benefits than what are afforded by the State courts. If this be a well founded opinion, can subjects or citizens of a foreign State have a better claim to such provision? If neither the principles of the Constitution nor any sound maxims of distributive justice are favorable to the idea of extending the jurisdiction of the federal courts to controversies of minor importance between American citizens residing in different States, can those principles or maxims be more favorable to such enlargement of jurisdiction as to similar controversies wherein aliens are parties? Every consideration opposed to such a measure in relation to the former cases, must resist that idea with at least equal force when applied to the cases last mentioned. No good reason, in the opinion of this Committee, can exist in favor of recommending such a discrimination.

Having contemplated this subject on general principles, and having made the foregoing deductions, the Committee then directed their attention to the particular situation of the petitioners, as stated in their memorial. In respect to the trouble and expense to which they allege their agents and themselves are exposed in prosecuting suits for the recovery of their debts in different courts of the Commonwealth of Virginia, it is to be remarked that, if the inconveniences suggested should be removed from them by the establishment of the tribunal they solicit, what would be the consequence? From their own showing, it is evident that a considerable number of individuals—a number much greater than their own number, together with that of their agents and those they represent, would be exposed to greater inconveniences, trouble, and expense, in attending court at one particular place, from many of whom that place would necessarily be very remote. To grant the prayer of the petitioners merely on this ground of complaint, would be to oppress a considerable number of citizens for the accommodation of a much smaller number of persons who are not citizens. A principle which would justify this step is a sort of principle totally inadmissible by this Committee, as a rule by which to decide on what is just and proper.

As to the allegation that they have frequently incurred "entire loss of debts supported by such documents and principles as have in similar cases insured their recovery in the federal court," the Committee would observe that, however such different decisions may have taken place, it is not admitted as a necessary inference, that the decisions complained of were not as just as those from which recoveries were obtained. And as to that part of the petition which complains that some of the State courts are influenced by no "uniform course of decision," in cases supported by the "same principles of law and evidence," the Committee would remark that, if such be the fact, of which however, no evidence has been submitted, the inconvenience cannot be peculiar to the petitioners; it must extend to all the citizens of the State who have controversies in the different courts. The Committee cannot perceive any propriety in making a provision for the sole purpose of meeting their especial cases.

As another ground of complaint, it is stated that the courts of Virginia do not "in practice respect the decisions of the circuit and supreme courts of the United States," in relation to British debts. While the Committee think it proper to observe, that this part of the complaint is also unsupported, but by the mere allegation of the petitioners, they would remark at the same time that it is not deemed material to inquire into that circumstance, in order to make up their own opinion as to the competency of those courts to administer justice between the parties, in deciding the cases in question.

In whatever point of view this subject is considered, this Committee perceive no just ground to disapprove of the policy which dictated the existing limits in the jurisdiction of the circuit courts, so as to deem it proper to recommend any extension of that jurisdiction, or the establishment of any other tribunal, to meet the wishes of the petitioners. They therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition.

GEORGIA CLAIMS.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution reported the twenty-ninth instant, from the Committee of the Whole, on the Georgia Claims.

Mr. JACKSON.—Mr. Speaker, I rise with some degree of reluctance to address you on the present occasion, not because I fear to give publicity to my sentiments on the question before the House, but from the assurance, that the length of time which this subject has occupied at the last, and during the present session of Congress, renders it most certain that no new view can be given; and more especially that the opinions already formed cannot be changed. I would not now have risen but for the wish that inasmuch as a most extraordinary course has been pursued, and a general denunciation of every man who dares, to favor the report on your table has been made, my reasons may accompany my vote, and I am willing that they together may form the criterion by which my political existence shall be decided. The reluctance I felt in rising is somewhat removed by the reflection, that the arguments urged on this floor are declared not intended to influence the judgment of this House, but to control the public mind, by an avowed appeal to the people of the United States. Let the appeal be fairly made, and I fearlessly await their decision. For that purpose, I deem it proper to offer my sentiments, in order that they may accompany those of my two colleagues who have preceded me. Sir, I am decidedly in favor of the report of the Committee of Claims, and of course opposed to the amendment under consideration. I do not on this occasion regret the absence of party spirit from these walls, which has been invoked by my colleague (Mr. RANDOLPH.) That party spirit which has been the bane of all Governments; that party spirit which, disregarding all the forms of justice, tramples its most sacred laws under foot, and presides without check or control over questions relating solely to private property; or which was displayed in the conduct of Jeffries, who servilely prostrating his sacred functions to the purposes of ministerial vengeance, has justly excited the reproach and execration of posterity: and which, if cherished upon occasions like the present will tend to demolish the fair fabric of our Republican Government. I will not admit that because a majority of this House are in favor of the claims, and desire a prompt decision without debate, it is evidence that "unprincipled men have acquired the ascendancy, and knowing themselves to be in the commission of wrong they are silent." Is my colleague aware of the extent of this doctrine? When unprincipled men, said he, acquire the ascendancy, they act in concert and are silent—silence and concert then are to him proofs of corrupt motive. Is this always a correct position? Does the gentleman recollect that measures were adopted a few years past without discussion, by my political friends in conjunction with him, who were silent, and united? I am unwilling to believe that such an inference can result from an union of sentiment. In some instances we are unanimous in our decision of questions, on which no debate takes place; but I have never thought this was proof of the prostration of principle; nor can I suppose that the gentleman himself thinks so; even now we adopt measures advocated by him, and are nevertheless told that to act in concert is proof of corruption. Having premised that the inferences made by the gentleman were not correct, I will proceed to the investigation of the question before the House, viz: Are the claims under the act of 1795, entitled to reference to commissioners for compromise and settlement, or are they not? My colleague (Mr. RANDOLPH) says the persons who obtained the land from the Legislature of Georgia were guilty of a most detestable fraud; and the present claimants, pretending to be innocent purchasers without notice of fraud, are a set of hypocrites, undeserving the attention of Congress, or the commiseration of mankind. In support of this assertion he has quoted the Message of the President of the United States, in 1795, to Congress, describing in terms of approbation the high character of its author—WASHINGTON—whose memory I revere, and whose name I will teach my children to lisp, and venerate as the father of American freedom, and who with Liberty were the two best gifts bestowed by Heaven upon our favored country! WASHINGTON, my colleague says, gave notice to the nation, and published the rape of unhallowed hands upon the property of the State of Georgia. But, sir, if we examine the Message, and the proceedings of Congress upon the occasion, it will be discovered that no knowledge of fraud in the transactions of the Legislature of 1795, were even known, or suspected; because, if any such information had been received, the known integrity of that virtuous man assures me, he would have communicated it; he would have opposed it with his best exertions, and give me leave to say, deprecated it as much as any man can. The Message of the President, which the gentleman contends contains this ample notice of fraud to all the world, was sent to Congress on the 17th of February, and is to be found in the Journal of the second session of the third Congress, page 245. With permission I will read it.

"Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives :

"I have received copies of two acts of the Legislature of Georgia, one passed on the 28th day of December, 1794, the other the 7th January, 1795, for appropriating and selling the Indian lands within the territorial limits claimed by that State. These copies, though not officially certified, have been transmitted to me in such a manner, as to leave no room to doubt of their authenticity. These acts embrace an object of such magnitude, and their consequences may so deeply affect the peace and welfare of the United States, that I have thought it necessary to lay them before Congress."

In this Message there is not a single mention of fraud: but that the acts of Georgia might affect the "peace and welfare of the United States." The meaning of this was, not that fraud was committed in the sale, and known to the President; but that the peace of the United States might be endangered by the sale. The country was an important one, both in its extent and situation; then in possession, and claimed by powerful nations of Indians; the magnitude of the prize might induce the claimants and others, deriving titles from them, to make a desperate effort to settle the country, and drive out the Indians. Hence the danger of a war with them, or, as the President expressed it, the fear that the "peace and welfare" of the United States would be affected.

The committee to whom this Message was referred, reported on the twenty-third February, 1795, as will be seen in page 260 of the Journal:

"Mr. Nicholas, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message from the President of the United States of the 17th instant, as relates to the disposition of the Indian lands, by the Legislature of the State of Georgia, made a report; which was read and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow."

On the next day (page 271) the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and made some progress. On the 25th of February, (see page 276,) the House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, and came to several resolutions, which were reported by Mr. Cobb, and were ordered to lie on the Clerk's table. Then follows the following motion:

"Resolved, That all persons who shall be assembled or imbodyed in arms on any lands belonging to Indians, out of the ordinary jurisdiction of any State, or of the Territory south of the river Ohio, for the purpose of warring against the Indians, or of committing depredations upon any Indian town, &c., shall be punished."

"Ordered, That the motion be referred to Mr. Sedgwick, Mr. Madison, and Mr. Hillhouse."

In page 279, on the 26th February, the House considered the resolutions reported by the Committee of the Whole on the preceding day; which were agreed to, as follows:

"1st. Resolved, That Congress will co-operate with the President of the United States in giving due effect to all such Constitutional and legal means as he shall adopt and pursue to prevent the infraction of the treaties made with the Indian tribes."

"2d. Resolved, That it be recommended to the President of the United States not to permit treaties for the extinguishment of the Indian title to any lands, to be holden at the instance of individuals or of States, where it shall appear that the property of such lands, when the Indian title shall be extinguished, will be vested in, or claimed by particular persons: And that, whenever treaties are held for the benefit of the United States, individuals claiming rights of pre-emption shall be prevented from treating with the Indians concerning the same; and that, generally, such private claims be postponed, to those of the several States, wherever the same may be consistent with the welfare and defence of the United States."

"3d. Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to obtain a cession of the State of Georgia, of their claim to the whole or any part of the land within the present Indian boundaries."

"Ordered, That the first and second resolutions do lie on the table."

"Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the last resolution, and that Mr. Nicholas, Mr. Macon, Mr. Murray, Mr. Findley, Mr. Boudinot, Mr. Ames, and Mr. Sherburne, do prepare and bring in the same."

"Mr. Sedgwick, from the committee to whom was referred a motion of the 25th inst., respecting such persons as shall be assembled or imbodyed in arms on any lands belonging to Indians, out of the ordinary jurisdiction of any State or of the Territory of the United States south of the river Ohio, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House, to-morrow."

The next mention of this subject is in page 285, viz: on the 27th February, the House "resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the committee to whom was referred a motion of the 25th," and came to the resolution contained in page 291:

"Resolved, That all persons who, unauthorized by law, and with hostile intent, may be found in arms on any lands allotted to or secured to the Indians by treaties between the United States and any Indian tribes, shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit a sum not exceeding — dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding — months, unless it shall be in continuation of a pursuit to a distance not exceeding — miles beyond the line of the particular Indians who shall have recently committed murder, or may be carrying off captives or plunder."

"The second resolution being again read, and amended at the Clerk's table, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

"Resolved, That it shall be lawful for the military force of the United States to apprehend every person or persons found in arms, as aforesaid, and him or them to convey to the civil authority of the United States within some one of the States, who shall, by such authority, be secured to be tried in manner and form as is provided in and by the act, entitled 'An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes:' Provided, That no person shall be confined, after his arrest and before his removal, more than — days."

Here, then, is a faithful abstract of the whole proceedings, evincive of the intention of the President and Congress, and it most clearly appears, that these proceedings had no reference to any fraud. The primary object and whole intention to be collected from them was to prevent the settlement of the country by individuals, either by waging war against the Indians, or extinguishing the Indian title; and to prevent a sale by Georgia, except to the United States, of their remaining undisposed of territory; for Georgia still had a large tract of land, after the passage of the act of 1795. But, says my colleague, Congress resolved to apply for the purchase of all the territory in question; and this is notice to the claimants who are now before us. Sir, the gentleman mistakes the resolution; it is "that the President of the United States be authorized to obtain a cession from the State of Georgia, of (mark the expressions) their claim to the whole, or any part of the land within the present Indian boundaries." Here is a most substantial distinction between the case put by my colleague, and the one stated in the resolve; it is not authorizing the purchase from Georgia of all or part of the territory in question, but of their claim to all or any part of the land within the Indian boundaries. From the whole of the documents, it does appear that neither the President nor Congress knew there was fraud, or that any notice, express or implied was given; that the measure originated in corruption; and it does not by any means appear that the present claimants had such notice.

I will now examine that part of the memorial of the New England Mississippi Land Company, which declares that they were specially intended to be provided for in the Convention between the United States and the State of Georgia; and that the act of Congress contains a correspondent provision. Upon this subject my colleague has asserted, that they have "suggested an absolute, direct, and palpable falsehood." If they were not intended, they assert a falsehood; if they were, they do not. A recurrence to the articles with Georgia; and to the act of Congress, will place this subject upon its proper basis, and by them it will appear whether they were intended to be specially provided for, or not. In the agreement with Georgia it is, among other things, declared, page 5, of the Message from the President of the United States, accompanying the article of agreement and cession, which had been entered into between the Commissioners of the United States and of Georgia, dated on the 26th of April, 1802, after the cession of territory as described in the first article, upon the express conditions therein stated, the first of which conditions provides for the payment of the purchase money. The following additional provisions are made:

"Secondly. That all persons, who, on the twenty-seventh day of October, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, were actual settlers within the territory thus ceded, shall be confirmed in all the grants legally and fully executed prior to that day by the former British Government of West Florida, or by the Government of Spain, and in the claims which may be derived from any actual survey or settlement made under the act of the State of Georgia, entitled 'An act for laying out a district of land situate on the river Mississippi, and within the bounds of this State, into a county, to be called Bourbon,' passed the seventh day of February, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five.

"Thirdly. That all the lands ceded by this agreement to the United States, shall, after satisfying the above-mentioned payment of one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars to the State of Georgia, and the grants recognised by the preceding condition, be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States, Georgia included, and shall be faithfully disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever: Provided, however, That the United States, for the period and until the end of one year after the assent of Georgia to the boundary established by this agreement shall have been declared, may, in such manner as not to interfere with the above-mentioned payment to the State of Georgia, nor with the grants hereinbefore recognised, dispose of or appropriate a portion of the said lands, not exceeding five millions of acres, or the proceeds of the said five millions of acres, or of any part thereof, for the purpose of satisfying, quieting, or compensating, for any claims other than those hereinbefore recognised, which may be made to the said lands, or to any part thereof. It being fully understood that, if the act of Congress making such disposition or appropriation, shall not be passed into a law within the above-mentioned period of one year, the United States shall not be at liberty thereafter to cede any part of the said lands on account of claims which may be laid to the same, other than those recognised by the preceding condition, nor to compensate for the same; and in case of any such cession or compensation, the present cession of Georgia to the right of soil over the land thus ceded or compensated for, shall be considered as null and void, and the lands thus ceded or compensated for, shall revert to the State of Georgia."

Here, sir, is a special provision "for the appropriation of a tract," not exceeding five millions of acres, for the purpose of satisfying, quieting, or compensating for any claims other than those therein before recognised, which may be made to the said lands, or any part thereof. Nothing can be more clear or better settled than that the claims of 1789 and 1795, and especially those of 1795, were specially intended by the articles of cession. If, however, we could doubt as to the meaning of the articles themselves, it would be entirely dissipated on a reference to the report of the Commissioners in page 25 of the same Message; speaking of the propositions of the claimants under the act of 1795, which they deem inadmissible; and of their title, which, they say, "cannot be supported," they add:

"But they, nevertheless, believe, that the interest of the United States, the tranquillity of those who may hereafter inhabit that territory, and various equitable considerations, which may be urged in favor of most of the present claimants, render it expedient to enter into a compromise on reasonable terms.

"Under this impression, a plan is respectfully submitted to the consideration of Congress, which, although it does not give a full indemnity to every claimant, is believed, from such information as has been received, to give in the aggregate nearly as much as has been paid in the whole by all the present claimants.

"As it is understood and generally agreed, that the five millions of acres reserved by the agreement with Georgia, constitute the fund from which the indemnity is to be paid, it is of primary importance, in order to guard against any depreciation, that the nominal sum in money, which may be offered as an indemnity, should not exceed what the sum may be thought amply sufficient to discharge. The probable amount of the annual sales, and the price affixed to the land by Congress, furnish the only data by which that sum can be determined. The Commissioners have supposed that the sales could not reasonably be estimated to yield more than three or four hundred thousand dollars annually; and although it has been presumed that in opening a land office, the price of the land will, at present, be fixed at two dollars per acre; they have believed that it would be improper to assume the payment of any sum out of the proceeds of the lands, which would bind Congress not to reduce the price hereafter, if other considerations shall render that reduction expedient.

"It is after having considered the subject in that point of view, that the Commissioners have been induced to submit the following propositions as the basis of a compromise.

"First. That so much of five millions of acres as shall remain after having satisfied the claims of settlers and others, not recognised by the agreement with Georgia, which shall be confirmed by the United States, be appropriated for the purpose of satisfying and quieting the claims of the persons who derive their claims from an act of the State of Georgia, passed on the 7th day of January, 1795."

They were specially intended by the Commissioners of the United States, who negotiated the treaty with Georgia; and this intention, as I have urged, plainly appears on the face of the treaty itself. The remaining branch of this inquiry is, Were they specially intended by the provisions of the act of Congress? On the third day of March, 1803, the law upon this subject was enacted, and is to be found in volume 6th, page 273, of the laws of the United States, the 8th and 9th sections of which have reference particularly to this subject.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That so much of the five millions of acres reserved for that purpose by the articles of agreement above-mentioned, as may be necessary to satisfy the claims not confirmed by that agreement, which are embraced by the two first sections of this act, or which may be derived from British grants for lands which have not been regranted by the Spanish Government, be, and the same is hereby appropriated for that purpose; and so much of the residue of the said five millions of acres or of the net proceeds thereof as may be necessary for that purpose, shall be, and is hereby appropriated for the purpose of satisfying, quieting, and compensating, for such other claims to the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee, not recognised in the above-mentioned articles of agreement, and which are derived from any act or pretended act of the State of Georgia, which Congress may hereafter think fit to provide for; Provided, however, that no other claims shall be embraced by this appropriation, but those, the evidence of which shall have, on or before the first day of January next, been exhibited by the claimants to the Secretary of State, and recorded in books to be kept in his office for that purpose, at the expense of the party exhibiting the same, who shall pay to the person employed by the Secretary of State for recording the same, at the rate of twelve-and-a-half cents for every hundred words contained in each document thus recorded; nor shall any grant, deed, conveyance, or other written evidence of any claim to the said lands, derived, or pretended to be derived from the State of Georgia, and not recognised by the above-mentioned articles of agreement, ever after be admitted or considered as evidence in any of the courts of the United States, unless it shall have been exhibited, and recorded, in the manner and within the time above-mentioned; and provided also, that nothing herein contained, shall be construed to recognise or affect the claims of any person or persons, to any of the lands above-mentioned; and provided also, that no certificate shall be granted for lands lying east of the Tombigbee river, nor for land situated without the boundary lines established by treaty between the United States and the Choctaws, made the 17th day of October, in the year 1802.

"SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General for the time being, be, and are hereby authorized and empowered to receive such propositions of compromise and settlement, as may be offered by the several companies, or persons claiming public lands in the territory of the United States lying south of the State of Tennessee, and west of the State of Georgia; and report their opinion thereon to Congress at their next session."

They were most certainly intended here; if they were not, the sections are sheer nonsense. Claims derived from any act, or pretended act of Georgia, are none other than the claims of 1795.

My colleague, contending that the claimants have asserted a falsehood in their memorial by alleging they were specially intended to be provided for—in which I trust I have proven he was mistaken—added, and they too talk of national faith and national honor as being pledged to make them compensation. Sir, I do not think with him that the appeal, thus made, is a prostitution of virtue and truth to vile purposes; but that national faith and national honor are pledged to them—not the faith and honor which my colleague ascribes to infamy and baseness, but the faith which, for the honor of my country, I hope will endure forever, and the honor which, co-extensive with our faith, will be the best patrimony we can hand down to posterity, at once their pride and national glory. In support of the opinion I have formed, I refer to the articles with Georgia, and the report of our Commissioners advising a compromise; and that the claimants should within a given time register their titles, as also the act of Congress making provision for the quieting and compensating claims derived under any act, or pretended act of Georgia. "Any act or pretended act." Here is a most explicit reference to the '95 claims. The Legislature of that State, in that year, were guilty of gross fraud and perfidy, their act was repealed, expunged from the records of Georgia, and burned. It was called a pretended act by the repealing Legislature, and it has never been contended that any other act of the State was illegitimate. It is alluded to by the appellation of pretended act, in as strong terms as the English language can convey the idea; and the ninth section, which I have read, holds out the assurance of a wish to compromise, by authorizing the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, to receive propositions from the several companies, or persons claiming lands. I repeat it, sir, I think the faith of the Government is pledged to make a compromise with the claimants, if it can be done; if not, I ask why were the claimants required to register the evidences of their titles, at their own expense, in the office of the Secretary of State? Why did we say to the State of Georgia, you must give us (remember we did not purchase it) five millions of acres of land to quiet those and other claims, if we had no intention to allow any of them? Why did we pass a law respecting the compensation for claims under any act or pretended act of the State of Georgia, if no claims whatever, under the act or pretended act of Georgia, were to be compromised and settled? And why did we call upon the claimants to incur a great expense in registering the evidences of their titles, and to make propositions of compromise, unless we intended that they should derive some benefit from a compliance? Unless, sir, Congress did intend to make some compromise with the claimants, this was a language of deception, as it regarded the State of Georgia, unworthy of the American Government, and it was adding insult to injury, and expense to both, as it regarded the claimants. It declared in effect: "Commissioners of Georgia, we require five millions of acres of land to compensate these and other claims"—it is obtained. "Claimants register your titles at your own expense, or you will be barred"—this is done. Then, "speculators, swindlers, public plunderers, begone! you have nothing to hope or expect from us." Is this conduct dignified? Is it honorable? I trust it is not, and will not be practised. My colleague alleges that the willingness of the claimants to take one-tenth of what they claim, is conclusive evidence of the injustice of the claim. Sir, the claimants, in their memorial, state a sufficient answer to this argument: "the delay of justice is its denial." What rational expectations can they have to acquire a sufficient indemnity unless in this way? They may indeed wait until the United States shall have disposed of the lands in question to some person hardy enough to purchase a disputed title, as until then they know they can have no opportunity to try their titles; and then the great expense of the law's delay, and the multiplicity of suits necessary to obtain adjudications to the extent of their claims, will produce unavoidable ruin. There is another substantial reason. They do not wish to contend with the strong arm of Government, and instead of their willingness to effect an amicable compromise operating as an evidence of the injustice of their claims, it affords a great proof of their magnanimity and patriotism. They consider themselves entitled to a full compensation, but, consulting the interests of the nation, they are willing to accept a pittance. My colleague says, he last year proved that Georgia had no right to make a grant of the land in question; this is an immaterial point—it is, however, not conceded. I contend we have obtained a recognition of the justice and equity of the claims, and are bound to provide for them. The same gentleman, not satisfied with the arguments he has used, endeavors to make it a party question, and deplores the absence of party spirit. Justice, Mr. Speaker, like the dews of heaven, should be showered down upon all men indiscriminately. She soars above the horizon of political speculators, and disdains to be told of any distinctions; and when she decides in favor of any man, it is because truth, immutable from the beginning of the world to the end thereof, is on his side, accompanied by reason co-extensive with time itself. Tell me not then, when we invoke her aid, that this or that man is good or bad; she is blind to parties, but eagle-eyed to search out truth. What is it to me if the Postmaster General, who is one of the agents, has as many millions as would balance the wealth of the Old World? If he is entitled, fairly and honestly entitled to more, I will give it. But his official powers scatter confusion; men can be found, clothed with Senatorial honors, who will abandon them, and by accepting offices within his gift, prostrate themselves at his feet, and others are ready to receive the snug contracts he can bestow. Hence, if the measure which he advocates be adopted, it will be proof of "corrupt influence which scatters confusion." Is the gentleman aware of the tendency of this doctrine? The Executive recommends measures, and as the Executive has many valuable offices in its gift, presumed corruption may be urged in all cases of their adoption; although, as in the case of the Postmaster General, the individual members never receive the smallest benefit from the power of appointment to office; and although the national security, and the integrity of the members, forbid the imputation.

As to the contracts spoken of, the mode of disposal is, to prefer the lowest bidder. The principal clerk in the Post Office Department is a Federalist; and disappointed applicants, when others were preferred from motives of favoritism, would be found ready to promulge the perfidious act. Considering these circumstances, which are most important checks, and that, notwithstanding the avidity with which the press seizes on occasions of supposed impropriety in the acts of the Government, or any of its agents, not a single solitary case of malfeasance has ever been charged against this officer; I am confident none has existed. And here allow me to add, that the friends of this measure, whom my colleague has reduced to a level with ninety-five Yazoo men, have, quo ad hoc, the same security for their integrity, that the President of the United States and the Commissioners have for theirs—they recommended what we approve. Yes, sir, this measure, which, if adopted, he declared, made us a party to a nefarious swindling—the approvers of fraud—the felons who filch from the poor their support—which reduced us to a level with the corrupt Legislature of Georgia, in the year 1795, and made us patrons of a stupendous robbery—has been recommended by the President of the United States, and by the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General. The President of the United States, in his Message to Congress at the second session of the seventh Congress, after speaking of the convention with the State of Georgia, which was then ratified, and of certain negotiations with the Indians, adds, "we are to view this position as an outpost of the United States, surrounded by strong neighbors, and distant from its support. And how far that monopoly which prevents population should here be guarded against, and actual habitation made a condition of the continuance of title, will be for your consideration. A prompt settlement, too, of all existing rights and claims within this territory, presents itself as a preliminary operation." Remember, sir, that this Message was made on the 15th December, 1802; and the Message containing the convention with Georgia, and the report of the Commissioners, expressly mentioning all the species of claims, and particularly those under the act of 1795, bears date, the 26th of April, 1802, long before the delivery of the communication containing the recommendation I have just read.

And in page 25 of the report accompanying the Message I have quoted, (to wit, the Message of 26th April, 1802,) the Commissioners say, in express terms, they "believe that the interest of the United States, the tranquillity of those who may hereafter inhabit that territory, and various equitable considerations which may be urged in favor of most of the present claimants, render it expedient to enter into a compromise on reasonable terms." And who, sir, will have the hardihood to say the President of the United States and these high officers of Government have been influenced by sinister motives? It is (says my colleague) the spirit of Federalism which unites us. Sir, I am young in years, and I am a child indeed in politics: If this be the spirit of Federalism, and with all my enmity to it, which I own has been very great, if it consists in complying with prudent advice and honest engagements, in doing justice to the unfortunate, and deciding on questions of private right by the rules of universal law; I will receive it with open arms; I will cherish it, and hug it to my bosom with the affection of a father for a long lost son returning to the paths of virtue.

My colleague near me, (Mr. CLARK,) with the same liberality which characterizes his general conduct on this floor, has investigated the question of the legality of these claims and contended it was most clear that the parties have no species of legal right. I am not disposed to go largely into this examination; the volume presented by the agents, which is called a "profanation of argument," is an able vindication of it; I will, however, notice some of his positions. In establishing his premises, he assumes certain facts as conceded, which are denied in the most express and direct manner. First, that the claimants now before us had notice of fraud when they purchased the lands in question; this notice, he says, was unquestionably given by the Message of the President to Congress, and the proceedings in the House of Representatives. I have answered this assertion by a minute recapitulation of all the proceedings at that period; and I deny that they either express or imply fraud or corruption in the remotest manner. "They had notice by the presentments of the grand juries in the State of Georgia." Sir, I for one can declare I never saw those presentments in the newspapers; nay, farther, I never saw a Georgia newspaper, to my recollection, until I had the honor of a seat on this floor; they are not extensively circulated beyond the limits of the State; and the facts adduced by my colleague prove nothing. But (added the gentleman) here is presumed notice; facts, sir, always defeat presumptions; it is not a principle admitted in law, because it was possible that the party might have obtained notice, the inference must be that he had notice. And how is the fact of notice or no notice to be settled? My colleague well knows that if the United States shall sell any of these lands to individuals, and the claimants do, as they indubitably will, contest the title, the proper process will be the action of ejectment; in which it is a principle, than which no one is better established, that the eldest grant must prevail. What then? why, sir, the settler will resort to a court of equity, whose province it is to relieve against fraud, and he will charge in his bill in chancery that his antagonist derived his title from the act of a corrupt Legislature, and that he purchased of the grantee with notice of such fraud. The answer, which is sworn to, expressly denies the notice, for, sir, the parties solemnly avow they had no notice of fraud or corruption when they purchased, and a knowledge of their high characters leaves no doubt on my mind of its truth; and it is also a well settled rule in equity, that where the answer is responsive to the bill, it shall be conclusive, unless contradicted by two positive witnesses, or one witness, and strong corroborating circumstances. Where, then, is my colleague's doctrine of presumed—implied notice? They are, said he, pendente lite purchasers; and here the gentleman must have encountered a good old law maxim, that "a purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, has a good title," unless he is a pendente lite purchaser. What, sir! pendente lite purchasers, when they derive their title from the law of an independent Legislature! the grantees armed with its official records! the great seal of State affixed! a solemn acknowledgment of the receipt of payment in their possession! That it can be assimilated to a lis pendens between A and B, would indeed be a far-fetched supposition. If any suit was depending, it was between the Georgians and their corrupt agents, for abusing the trust reposed in them, not for exceeding their powers. As well might it be urged, that, if an individual give his agent full powers, and he sell his property at a shameful sacrifice, that a suit between such individual and his agent is to affect the property which he had power to sell. My colleague declares his willingness to make provision for such claims as shall appear to have originated in purchases without knowledge of fraud—these alone are the claims which I am willing to provide for; but we are solemnly assured by the applicants that they are all in this situation. Is this House competent to a due investigation of fifteen hundred claims? Sir, the whole period of a session will be inadequate to this object. It is to get rid of the great difficulty which such an inquiry would impose, and more especially to remove beyond our reach the possibility of renewing the unpleasant discussion which this subject has produced, and which, for the honor of my country, I hope will never be witnessed again, that I am desirous to refer the question as to the cases which are deserving of compensation, and the extent of it, to commissioners to be selected by the President, in whom the utmost confidence can be placed. My colleague near me declared that no contract originating in fraud can ever be rendered valid by any after transaction. I will prove to him an exception to this rule in the laws and judicial decisions of the State to which he belongs; and this, sir, will be sufficient to show that the universality of the rule cannot be contended for. In Virginia, our laws declare that no bond given for a gaming contract can be available in law; that money won at gaming may be recovered in a suit brought either by the party losing, or any other person who will sue for it; that all conveyances of land on that account shall be utterly void; yet, under this law, the High Court of Appeals have decided that where a party gave a bond for the payment of a gaming debt, and assured a third person in the presence of the obligee that it was good, and he would pay it; which third person received the bond by assignment, he should be ever afterwards incapable of claiming the benefit of the statute, and that the debt should be paid. But I shall be told by the gentleman, this is not a case analogous to the one before us. In answer to this, I will say, it is not necessary that it should be; it is a strong exception to his rule, and that was what I engaged to have.

Mr. Speaker, strip this question of all extraneous matter, and what is it? Plainly this: The United States are appointed trustees by the State of Georgia, to dispose of a certain designated fund which belonged originally to Georgia, and by the claimants it is contended was ceded to others, but which Georgia denies was a legitimate act. This fund, as I have shown, cost us nothing; we are requested, nay, we have engaged to appropriate it for quieting and compensating those claims thus contested; and to carry these engagements into execution, we are about to appoint commissioners of our own choice, with powers adequate to the object, and this act is denounced as a stupendous robbery, by an appeal to the people. Be it so. People of the United States, we invite your attention to this transaction; we confide in the purity of our motives, which are influenced by considerations of justice alone; and we rely on you for an approval of our conduct. The persons whose claims are before us, are purchasers of land from the grantees of Georgia, for a valuable consideration, without notice of fraud; those from whom they purchased were in possession of the law of Georgia ratifying the sale of grants, duly executed with all the solemn formalities, and of receipts for the purchase-money. Many of the claimants are among the most distinguished characters in the Northern States; they had held, and then held, important offices under the State authority, and had taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States; which declares that full faith and credit shall be given to the acts and judicial proceedings of the respective States; their inclination as well as their oaths induced them to give full credit to them. It could not be presumed by them that the Representatives of a sister State had been corrupted; and although the act of sale might have been indiscreet, and a bad bargain to the venders; they knew, also, that the Constitution prohibited the States from passing any ex post facto law, by which any title vested in others will be impaired. Under these circumstances, they ask that we should give them a part of the property set apart for satisfying their claims, or permit their right to be decided before the judicial tribunals of the nation; and to grant this request, is what the majority of the House of Representatives believe that justice, no less than sound policy, dictates; and this is what we have been told is a stupendous robbery. I rely on the policy of this measure; that alone is sufficient, in my opinion, to warrant the adoption of this report. We can now quiet these claims by a portion of the five millions; they may, if not quieted, recover fifty millions by the decrees of our courts of justice; this is a serious reason in favor of the policy of the measure. Last year, when, as my colleague alleges, the press was gagged, and a virtual seditious law was in force, he declared "let them get a decree of the courts in their favor, let them take possession of the property, and I will expend the last dollar in the Treasury, and sacrifice the last life in the nation to fight them out of the country." [Here Mr. RANDOLPH declared, loud enough to be heard, that he still said so.]

Mr. JACKSON proceeded. The gentleman declares that he is still in the same mind; that these principles are to be trampled under foot by a lawless soldiery. Is this true policy? God forbid that my colleague, whose influence in this House is equal to the rapacity of the speculator whose gigantic grasp has been described by him, as extending from the shores of Lake Erie, to the mouth of the Mobile, should make the nation think so.* Sir, an enlightened and independent judiciary is the safeguard of the poor against the tyranny of the rich, it is the safeguard of the citizen against the tyranny of his Government. In England, sir, the virtue of the judiciary has, except in a few instances, disgraceful to their authors, been the only refuge of the subject against the gripings of tyranny; the judiciary there has been the pride and boast of that nation, and has excited the eulogies of this. Our judiciary is the sheet anchor of safety against popular fury, or the more destructive though less violent attacks of usurpation. I look to it with veneration and respect, as the preserver of civil rights and civil liberty; but if it is to yield to the power of an army, and its decrees are to be reversed on the points of hiring mercenary bayonets; then, indeed, naught remains of liberty but the name, a phantom not worth preserving. It is politic, in the language of the President, to compromise these claims; "a prompt settlement, too, of all existing claims within this territory, presents itself as a preliminary operation." It is politic, sir, on every ground; many eminent lawyers, alike superior to the quirks and quibbles of the law, as well as the heresy of making the law yield to a military force, believe in the legality of these claims, and if there is a pretext of law on their side, it will produce more injury than the value of the land they are willing to take. I speak experimentally upon this subject—ten millions of acres of land (by computation) in the district I represent, are claimed by persons called the Indiana Company, by a grant from the Six Nations of Indians! In the year 1744 a public treaty, under the regal authority, was held at Lancaster with those Indians, and at that time they ceded the whole of their title to all the lands within the chartered limits of the State. Some years afterwards, viz: in the year 1768, as an indemnity to a company of merchants for goods forcibly taken by the Indians, they ceded

[* The following is inserted by request:] Mr. RANDOLPH having informed Mr. JACKSON that he had misapprehended what he said in debate on the Georgia claims at the last session, (which has never been published,) and Mr. R. having declared that what he really said was to the following effect, viz: "That if, when the Indian title to the lands in question should be extinguished, and intruders, under the act of Georgia of 1795, should attempt a settlement contrary to law, (a reason urged by some in favor of compromise,) he (Mr. R.) would extend the strong arm of Government, and drag them from the lands of the United States, would spend the last dollar, and sacrifice the last life, before he would submit to the usurpation." Mr. JACKSON has no hesitation in admitting upon this information, that he may have mistaken Mr. R.'s expressions.

a large tract of land, bounded by the Laurel Hill, on the east, the Pennsylvania line, on the north, the Ohio river, on the west, and the Little Kenbawa, on the south, to Trent and others. In 1779, this company petitioned the Virginia Legislature to grant them some compensation; this they refused to do, and proceeded to pass sundry resolutions upon the subject, namely, that this grant to Trent and his associates was null and void; that the exclusive right of pre-emption from the Indians was vested in the Government; and that they would vindicate its rights to their utmost power.

Soon after the Constitution was adopted, suit was brought against Virginia in the Federal court, and, in consequence of the amendment concerning the suability of the States, it was dismissed. Various efforts were afterwards made by the company to obtain some allowance, and, finally, they instituted a suit against us in the Virginia circuit court of the United States, which is now depending. I presume, from a reference to the dates of the grants and the established rule that individuals cannot purchase the Indian title, every member of this House will join me in saying that there is no chance of success for the company; yet, sir, the District Attorney of Virginia, who my colleague, on a former occasion, pronounced to be a gentleman of great legal learning, (which I also admit,) has given an opinion in their favor, and he, with other eminent lawyers, equally as learned as himself, are their counsel. The effect of the existence of this claim is, that a tract of country larger than Massachusetts, separated from the province of Maine; larger than Connecticut, New Hampshire, or Vermont; possessing the most salubrious climate in the United States, a most fertile soil, and temperature second to none in the Union; situated, too, upon large navigable rivers; scarcely contains thirty thousand inhabitants: and even now, in consequence of a renewal of the suit, our most valued citizens are abandoning their homes, which are sold for much less than their value, and removing to a country where no such dispute can annoy them. Sir, if we had resorted to a compromise, which they sought and urged, the allowance of their utmost demand would have been much less than the injury we have so sensibly felt.

Mr. Speaker, having taken this view of the subject, I shall, notwithstanding the claimants have been denounced as swindlers, liars, hypocrites, and accessaries to a stupendous robbery, which far outstrips the petty larcenies of the federalists, vote for the reference of their claims to commissioners; because I believe their respectful exercise of a Constitutional right, the right of petitioning, is entitled to attention, and because I do not think they are base men, but abused in a cruel manner, whose lives refute the charges made against them; and if I were permitted to address them upon the occasion, I would say, be not afraid of the shafts of slander, your characters are your shields; and I would add, in the language of a great man, who, after an attentive study of human nature, declared—

“Be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, Thou shalt not escape calumny.”

Mr. FINDLEY said that he claimed the attention of the House for a short time; but from viewing the unusual turn some of the arguments had taken, and the nature of the subject, he found it a matter of some delicacy to know how to proceed. He was opposed to the amendment under debate, and in favor of the resolution, but he observed some members, with whom he had generally voted, and for whose talents he had a high esteem, and in whose integrity he had the utmost confidence, take the other side with such ardent zeal, and in a mode of argument so unusual in public bodies, that on observing this he had hesitated and had voted in the last session for the postponement which took place. He had done this in hopes that the House would in this session meet the case in a temper more becoming their own dignity and the importance and delicacy of the subject. In deciding on this case, they did not act solely in their usual legislative character, which was to make rules for the future conduct of the citizens. In this case they were in the very delicate situation of both parties and judges, in addition to that of legislators—a situation always to be avoided if possible, and when it cannot be avoided, it should be conducted with the greatest decorum. Awed by this situation, Mr. F. said he had again and again viewed the subject in every aspect in which it presented itself to him, and examined it by the rules of equity, of expediency, and policy, with as great attention as he had ever done any case on which he was called to act, and excited by the unprecedented attacks made on the motives and character of the members in opposition to the amendment, when fair and candid argument failed. For his own disinterestedness in the question, he would take the liberty of appealing to the God of judgment, to whom he was to be accountable for the honesty of his decision in this and every other case, and on whose subordinate throne of judgment on earth he considered the House in the present decision to be seated and acting. So tedious an introduction was not usual to him, but on this occasion he thought there was a cause.

By these circumstances he was convinced that on this occasion it was his duty to mention to the House, at least, some of the reasons for the vote which it was his duty to give on this question, but would give them in as few words as it was in his power, to render them intelligible to the House; for this purpose he thought a narrative of the facts was in the first place necessary.

He said he would begin with the Message of the President near the close of the session in February, in the year 1795, informing Congress of the two laws made in Georgia, one in December and the other in the month of February, 1795, (the same Message mentioned by the member from Virginia, Mr. RANDOLPH.) The Message was referred to a select committee, of which he had the honor of being a member, with other very intelligent members from both South and East, (Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. AMES, &c.) It had long been the opinion of men well informed that the title of Georgia to the extent of territory she claimed was doubtful, and that it was too great for any one State to possess in connexion with the Federal Union. The old Congress frequently called on Georgia to make a cession of her unsettled territory, agreeably to the stipulations on which the Confederation was agreed to, but when Georgia did propose a cession, the terms on which it was made were rejected. Other States made cessions of lands to which they had no title, or else had appropriated the lands to individuals before the cession was made; so that, on the whole, but a small quantity of land unencumbered came to the benefit of the United States. But to return: the committee in February, 1795, examined the title of Georgia as far as they had information, the bounds not being certainly known; the unsettled territory of Georgia was believed to be larger than France or Germany, or any other European nation, except Russia, whose Asiatic dominions extend to the Pacific ocean; hence they concluded that such an extent of territory possessed by one State, at the extremity of the United States, and bordering its whole length on the Spanish dominions, with which we were then in danger of a serious contest, it was the opinion of the committee that every proper means should be used to induce Georgia to cede, in a peaceable manner, a proportion of that territory; and, as a first step towards obtaining this object, the committee reported that the Attorney General should examine the titles of the State of Georgia and of the lands claimed by the company from the law of 1795; and they further reported that the President should be authorized to obtain a cession from the State of Georgia of the whole or part of the territory.

It was not certainly known that there was a defect in the title of Georgia, but from the circumstances of the small extent of that colony at the beginning, and in various extensions by different royal proclamations, &c., the title of Georgia was held in doubt. It is well known that the State of Georgia at first was pitched into the State of South Carolina, which for a considerable time granted titles for land south of the State of Georgia, and one degree of latitude which the United States claimed from the definitive treaty with Britain, was yet in the possession of Spain; but this the members of Georgia considered also as within the jurisdiction of that State. This being the case, the committee thought it prudent to make no mention of the supposed defect of the title of Georgia. The committee, and particularly himself, suspected that different laws enacted by that State for the sale of land, and particularly the recent sale of 1795, was encouraged by their own suspicion of a defective title, but they knew nothing of the bribery and corruption assigned as a reason in the year following, for annulling the contract; therefore it was, that no notice to the contractors that Congress doubted the title of Georgia was given. There was no precedent in the United States of a contract authorized by a Constitutional Legislative act being declared null and void by a succeeding Legislature. The power of decisions on frauds and corruptions, or the validity of titles being vested in the courts of justice in all civilized countries, such a decision could only be looked for from that department; but neither a judge who is stated to have been corrupted was impeached, nor any of the members indicted. If this had been done, warning would have been thereby given, and the title might have been called in question; but it was not, nor is not yet done. Therefore, though by the report of the committee printed in the Journals, which few read, it was not published in the laws, which are more generally read and published in the papers, it might have been discerned that Congress had some design of acquiring the sovereignty of some part of that territory, yet no man could infer that there was any intention to interfere with the legal appropriations of the soil, or to what extent the United States would claim or acquire the territory. Therefore, it was justifiable to conclude that no public notice was given of any direct claim of the United States, either to the soil or sovereignty of Georgia. It is well known that the newspapers of Georgia circulate very little in the Middle or Eastern States. Though he read newspapers more than many others, he did not recollect ever to have seen a Georgia paper but with some of the members from that State with whom he then lodged; but though they and himself had disapproved of such an enormous sale of land, he heard no facts stated of fraud and corruption. He had heard, indeed, that several of the members had been the purchasers, but that had been the case in Pennsylvania and other States, of which he also disapproved, but could not prevent.

Mr. F. said, while the case was so situated, the New England purchasers, or long-legged speculators, did not, as his colleague (Mr. LUCAS) had said, go to Georgia, but the long-legged contractors or speculators of Georgia, went above a thousand miles to Massachusetts, an old, thick-settled country, the citizens of which needed land for their families, (a country which annually sent forth numerous emigrants, who generally purchased in large quantities and settled in large bodies together,) and sold the land at seven or eight times the original price, by which they gained near $1,000,000 advance. They went with the patents from the State of Georgia, and the law, and probably the constitution of that State, in their hands. This, alone, was sufficient to encourage purchasers among a people who needed land; but this was not all. The respectability of the characters of the sellers was such as would reasonably induce an opinion, that they could not themselves be deceived, and would not deceive others. Among these were a very respectable judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, who had been a member of the old Congress from almost its commencement till its dissolution, for as long a period as the State constitution would permit, and had been an efficient member of the Convention which prepared the Constitution of the United States, and several State conventions, and a gentleman who was then, and both before and after that time, a Senator of the United States, and many other very respectable characters—who, however, he acknowledged, had by that act, forfeited the character they had formerly enjoyed, and yet, strange to tell, neither before nor after the annulling act, he could not call it a law, as no such law could be made under the Constitution of the United States. The sale was annulled; but the judge said to have been corrupted, nor the federal judge, was impeached, nor any of the members of whom it was testified that they had received bribes, or were sharers in the spoil, were indicted, but still enjoy the confidence, as much as they otherwise would have done, of that State. Not one of them were removed from office, or in any official manner consigned to infamy, by the courts of that respectable State, or by impeachment.

The lands sold at Boston were yet in possession of the Indian tribes, and the Indian war but lately extinguished, while, at the same time, the lands in Pennsylvania were sold, the first rate at one shilling and sixpence; the reputed second rate—but in fact equal if not superior in quality and situation—at one shilling the acre; and what remained unsold to the old settlements, at sixpence; and, in New York, still cheaper the acre; when the Georgia purchase, with all its disadvantages, is stated and admitted to have been sold, rough and smooth, good and bad, and of which a large proportion is allowed to be bad, at something above fifteen pence an acre on the amount reserved. Certainly such a speculation, if it was one, was such as he would not have had any share in, and therefore no proof of the superior cunning ascribed to them by his colleague and others.

Mr. F. said that, so far, the bargain and sale were fair and legal; whether it was a good bargain or a bad one, was the look-out of the purchasers; if it was a bad one, Government would have given them no relief. Had nothing extraordinary, or out of the common road, taken place, he believed the attention of Congress would never have been called to the subject. Soon, however, after this contract was made, the Legislature of Georgia declared the contract, and the law under which it was made, to be void or annulled; and in a short time after, a convention of that respectable State disapproved of the constitutional act of the Legislature; but as long as we pay respect to Constitutional obligations and the distribution of the powers of Government, and as long as we respect the Federal Constitution, which expressly asserts that no ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, shall be made, we must agree that one session of a Legislature cannot annul the contracts made by the preceding session. If that could be done, the patent for his own plantation might also be set aside, for he acknowledged it is worth more now than the price that he paid for it. This doctrine had never been entertained even in the Revolutionary period. At that solemn period, all contracts were protected.

Mr. F. said that he cheerfully acknowledged that the amount of land sold under the law of Georgia of 1795, was so enormous as that, if that State had been a separate and wholly independent government, would have justified, in some degree, an agrarian law; and if the fraud and corruption attested by ex parte testimony was true, would have justified the most exemplary punishment of those who suffered themselves to be corrupted, or who defrauded the Commonwealth, and this would have proved a defect in the contract itself; but no such thing appears to have taken place. The judge, who is said to have received $13,000 for his vote, was not impeached, nor the members who are said to have given, or received bribes, indicted. It appears to have been so contrived that the State, or citizens of Georgia, should suffer no loss—that the loss and reproach should be transferred to people at the greatest possible distance. He gave credit, however, to the Legislature of Georgia, which met in the year 1796, for making an extraordinary exertion to free themselves from an extraordinary evil. It was a laudable testimony against corruption and fraud, but no court of justice had yet, by deciding on it, acknowledged it to be law, and it was too slow for warning others at a distance against titles originating under the law of 1795.

The annulling law of 1796 had all the effect that any citizen, at that period, could have wished. Congress took possession of the government of the western parts of Georgia, the parts in which the lands in question lay, and erected a territorial government, without the consent of that State, and passed a law authorizing the President to enter into a negotiation with Georgia on the principles of compromise, for the right of soil. The compromise eventually succeeded, and an act of cession took place between the United States and the State of Georgia. In this act of cession, or convention, it was provided that the claims in the counties of Bourbon and Washington, bordering on the Mississippi river, &c., should be protected, and that five millions of acres, or part thereof, should, by the United States, be applied to satisfy, quiet, or compensate, the claims now before the House, and that if they were not so applied, they should revert to the State of Georgia.

On these conditions, Mr. F. said, did Georgia surrender her right of soil. Agreeable to these conditions were the Commissioners of the United States authorized to make and receive proposals, but the Commissioners were not authorized to conclude the agreement, they did report to Congress, and in that report, they state that the claimants cannot, in their opinion, recover by law. This is well founded, because no action can be brought against the United States, nor, since the amendment made to the Constitution respecting the suability of States, against a State. Therefore this fund, viz: the five millions of acres, set apart by the convention of Georgia, to quiet, satisfy, or compensate these claims, must be either applied to that purpose, or revert to the State of Georgia, or the faith of the United States must be sacrificed.

Mr. F. said, that from this view of the subject, he had made up his mind to vote in favor of the report of the Committee of Claims. That he had not made up his mind lightly, that he had been prepossessed against it, but it becoming his duty to decide, he had thrown aside these prepossessions, and examined the case with all the coolness and deliberation of which he was capable, and would give his vote, as he had made up his mind, without consulting or relying on the opinions of others, for he was responsible only for his own opinion.

To this, however, he had heard objections of a kind, and delivered in a manner, which should receive no answer from him. He would, however, take notice of some made by his colleague, (Mr. LUCAS.) He had said, that as the land sold had been estimated at a little above 20,000,000 of acres, and that the second-hand purchasers claimed 40,000,000 of acres, and the Commissioners had made the estimate at 35,000,000 of acres; that this was a proof of fraud on their part, and a sufficient reason for refusing their claim. He said he would beg leave to inform that gentleman that even in the State where he lived, many surveys had much more land than was named in the patent, and the owner would hold the land without being subject to any imputation of fraud. That the sales now in question, and prior sales by the State of Georgia, not being sold by actual admeasurement, but by natural boundaries, closed by parallels of latitude, it was impossible to estimate the amount with accuracy, and that it was the duty of the seller as much as the purchaser, to take care that the estimate was correct, and that, let the mistake be where it would, it was by no means chargeable to the second-hand purchasers; the purchasers to whom bribing the Assembly of Georgia could not be imputed, as they resided at above a thousand miles distant, and never went to Georgia to make a speculation.

Mr. F. said, that on reflection, the acute discernment of his colleague would convince him that the claim of the Wabash company, for confirmation of their purchases from the Indians during the royal Government, and others which he had introduced, that were contrary to the rules of that Government, or speculations which he now informs us are making with the Indians further to the westward, had not the least analogy to the claim in question—that this was so evident as to need no explanation. He further observed that his colleague's, argument drawn from the character he was pleased to make for the people of New England, was irrelevant to the question, and that at least with respect to land speculations, was not founded in fact. If he took the character of those people from the seafaring men who made their living by trading along the southern coasts, that character would by no means apply to citizen farmers of that country.

Such addresses had been openly made to party spirit, and to the motives and virtue of the members, as were unbecoming public bodies, and unprecedented. In this country, we were in the habit of believing that men who took a solemn oath to serve the public faithfully, might differ in their opinion, but that they would still vote agreeable to their convictions, especially when they had no interest in doing otherwise; but, on this question, they were called on to rescue their characters from the charge of corruption and impure motives, and the Legislature turned into a court of inquisition. In support of this unusual mode of argument, his colleague had, with numerous repetitions, said that he would not act in that House otherwise than he would do out of doors, and that he would not act in the House in such a manner as he would blush for out of doors, &c. Mr. F. said he would assure his colleague, that in this they were agreed, and so he believed were all the members of the House; but, as this was an insinuation that the gentlemen ascribed this purity peculiarly to himself, to correct that impression he would assure him that he would also act in this House, as he would do out of doors, and that he would act such a part as never would lay him under the painful necessity of blushing in secret; in a situation where temporary popularity could give no relief to a wounded mind. He wished it still to be understood that he sincerely believed that other members would vote differently with the purest intentions; but these members being honest themselves, did not impute, nor even insinuate, a suspicion of dishonesty, in those who differed from them in opinion; doing so, indeed, looks so much the worse when it is charged on those who are acknowledged to be the majority of the representation of the United States. For his own part, he would not think himself justified in applying such arguments against the smallest minority he had ever seen in a public body.

Mr. F. said, from a long opportunity of observation, he believed that the people of New England were the least skillful or the most simple of any people in the United States, in their purchases of land, and that in endeavoring to account for this, he thought he had found sufficient data. Their country was long settled; in the present generation, there had been few, if any, contests about original titles. They well knew, that in sales between one man and another, there might be fraud, but that Governments should issue fraudulent patents, or grant titles on which disputes might afterwards arise, was a circumstance with which they were unacquainted. He well knew that about the same time that this purchase was made, land-meddling swindlers went from Pennsylvania with bundles of deeds for land, and the law agreeably to which they were made, and sold them in Massachusetts. Indeed, the land was not settled, but sold to individuals or companies. The people in the old settlements had no suspicion, because they had no experience of a vast body of land, at least six counties in Pennsylvania then unsettled, being at the same time appropriated to others. They purchased the fraudulent deeds, and many of them moved their families into the wilderness, and sat down on heavy-timbered land, reputed to be dear of the clearing, and, after they had spent their strength and endured incalculable hardships, found that the land was not their own, but the property of some Pennsylvania or foreign companies, or other land jobbers. He was informed of this peddling or swindling business by the then members from Massachusetts, who inquired of him for information; he informed them that the whole business was a fraud; that all the land in question had been sold long before, though not settled, and he advised them to inform their people. They did so, and put a stop to this mischievous business. But after they had paid the swindlers, and cleared the heavy beach-woods, to make a living, they were ejected; and, no doubt, after paying their money and spending their labor, they were averse to giving up their residence; but, he understood by the newspapers, that they were making overtures to the legal owners for the purchase of the titles.

The lease of the Wyoming settlers from Connecticut in Pennsylvania, which had given so much trouble to that State, and to whose claims he had been opposed, and had assisted in making laws against them, he considered as a proof of the observation he had made; they had rashly confided in a claim of the Connecticut government to part of Pennsylvania, and before that claim was decided had made purchases, and removed their families to the land they had purchased under that claim; they had defended it against the Indians, by whom many of them had been butchered in a most shocking manner; and they had resisted the laws of Pennsylvania, even after judgment was finally given against the claims of Connecticut by a court appointed for that purpose by the old Congress. They defeated even some laws expressly made for their advantage, and continued to live in poverty and uncertainty; long since this contest, they might have taken lands in that State agreeably to law, on very easy terms, and have lived undisturbed. In all this contest, during more than forty years, they have given a continued testimony of simplicity with respect to claims and titles for land, and, at the same time, however, they have set a notable example of perseverance under the greatest difficulties, occasioned by a savage war, and sometimes from an armed force from Pennsylvania. The proprietary government of that State never proposed to quiet these settlements, as had been done with intruders from other States, it having previously granted the land to others, but their obstinate perseverance has had its effect. After trying various and sometimes inconsistent methods, Pennsylvania has found it best at last to quiet their settlements on moderate terms, and for this purpose, to purchase the rights of the original purchasers from the proprietary government.

It had been objected to him by another of his colleagues, that he had himself voted for the repeal of a contract in the State Legislature; from his knowledge of that gentleman's candor and discernment, (Mr. GREGG,) he knew he would not have made this observation, if he had examined the case. Mr. F. said, in the course of a longer life than was common to many, at one time or other, in all the various public bodies, which instituted or conducted republican Governments, he had given some votes which he regretted, and many which he would not give again, if he had the opportunity; and he would never admit that a member was inconsistent for changing his opinion on better information. For what purpose is all our painful studies and wearisome debates, but to inform our judgment; and of what use is this information if we cannot take advantage of it for the public good. And if we have voted wrong, if we cannot correct it by changing our vote, we ought to prevent all discussions, all reading and study, and become mere machines. But though he advocated this right, he did not need it on this occasion, nor for his vindication against the charge of inconsistency.

The Bank of North America, the first bank in the United States, not chartered by the old Congress, which had no Constitutional authority to grant charters; but the situation of the United States, at that period, justified an extraordinary exertion. Congress, however, well knowing their own want of power, recommended to the States also to grant charters to the bank. The State of Pennsylvania granted a charter; other States refused to do it. The bank was put in operation. In 1784, a new company applied for a charter; the Bank of North America, the only one at that time in the United States opposed it, although parties were heard by counsel before the Legislature, but the decision on the question was postponed. In 1785, the question was taken up; the bank company was again heard by counsel in favor of their exclusive monopoly, without limitation of time; the incorporating law was repealed, and afterwards, a new charter was granted for a limited time, and with such restrictions of the monopoly as has permitted the operation of other banks in the State of Pennsylvania, and other States. This, however, was a charter of privileges, which, in free Governments, are always subject to the discretion of the Legislature; no price is paid for them, and the privilege may be always withdrawn when the public good requires it. But the claim before the House is of quite a different nature; it is a transfer of property by a competent authority, for which a more valuable consideration had been received by that State than for any sale of lands by that State, before or since that time, and the present claimants, on the faith of Government, had their purchase at a still much higher rate.

Much had been said about the extent of the purchase by the original grantees, and the corruption of the Legislature, but that was not before the House. The condition of the convention between the United States and Georgia was, that not 40, nor 35, nor 21,000,000 of acres, should be given to satisfy those claims, but that 5,000,000 of acres, or some part thereof, should be given, but 5,000,000 of acres is by that convention vested in the United States as a deposit for that purpose, and if not so applied, the deposit is to be returned to the State of Georgia; these are the facts on record, and if the record is true, the assertion so boldly made, that those who voted in favor of the report of the Committee of Claims were putting their hand into the public purse, that it was public robbery, &c., was not only unfounded, it was mere declamation. He would not say for what purpose. It was not the property or purse of the United States, but a deposit put in the hands of the United States for the very purpose for which the resolution before the House proposes to apply it.

Mr. F. said, that this was not only the opinion of the Committee of Claims, but of the Commissioners of the United States, who had the best opportunity of understanding the subject, and whose talents and integrity, it will be admitted, are not inferior to that of any member on this floor, and, in their words, he would conclude. In their report they say, that "the interest of the United States, the tranquillity of those who may hereafter inhabit that territory, and various equitable considerations that may be urged in favor of most of the present claimants, render it expedient to enter into a compromise on equitable terms."

Mr. GREGG.—I rise, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate the House, on the question being at length brought within such narrow limits. The validity of the title appears to be nearly abandoned, and the advocates of the resolution seem now disposed to rest its defence almost entirely on the ground of expediency. For my own part I have always felt satisfied with the report of the Commissioners, so far as it respects the question of title. They have investigated the subject with more diligence and attention than can well be bestowed on it by members of this House, and being men distinguished for their abilities and of high official standing, their opinion, certainly, should have great weight. That opinion, as recorded in their report, is, that the title of the claimants cannot be supported. In this opinion I most heartily concur, for I can never be induced to believe that an act so marked with fraud and corruption as the act of Georgia, under which the claimants pretend to derive their title, has been fully proved to be, can vest a title either in law or in equity.

The question of title being given up, any remarks respecting the weight that ought to attach to the rescinding act passed by the Legislature of Georgia, in 1796, will be unnecessary. On that part of the subject I will only just observe, in reply to one of my colleagues (Mr. FINDLEY,) who has stated that act to be without precedent, and that one Legislature cannot repeal an act of a preceding Legislature where it involves a contract, that there is one instance at least of such an act, and that instance is in the State in which he and I live. The case to which I allude, is an act passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, for repealing the charter of the Bank of North America. This act, if I am not mistaken, was passed when my colleague was a member of the Legislature, and I believe received his support.

But, leaving the question of title, good policy, say gentlemen, requires us to pass the resolution. In this sentiment, they and the Commissioners appear to unite. The Commissioners acknowledge that the title of the claimants cannot be supported, and yet undertake to recommend a compromise, by stating "that the interest of the United States, the tranquillity of those who may hereafter inhabit that territory, and certain equitable considerations which may be urged in favor of most of the present claimants, render it expedient to enter into a compromise on reasonable terms." Now, I would ask, how is the interest of the United States to be promoted by giving five millions of acres of land to persons acknowledged not to have a good title in law, and none in equity? If our interest is to be promoted in this way, we may soon get rid of all our land. Claimants will not be wanting, if it is to be got for asking.

With respect to the equitable considerations which have been urged so strenuously in favor of the present claimants, I must acknowledge they have not appeared to me so very forcible. The innocence of the claimants has been painted in strong and glowing colors. They have been represented, not only as innocent, but innocent through ignorance. One of my colleagues, in particular, has dilated largely on this idea, and applied it especially to the New England purchasers. In evidence of this, he has referred to the case of the Connecticut intruders in the State of Pennsylvania. But in this allusion he was certainly extremely unfortunate. The case might be cited to prove a position exactly the reverse. The fact is, that these intruders have for many years, by their superior skill and address, held their lands in defiance of the State; and, from appearance, I believe will continue to hold them, without making any compensation to the State; and this instance may serve to show the impropriety and inefficiency of governments pretending to compromise with individuals. The measures pursued by the State of Pennsylvania relative to these claimants have generally been of this description. They have produced no advantage to the State, and have always been converted by the intruders into arguments in favor of their claims. I do know of one case that goes far to prove that there are some persons in the Eastern States extremely uninformed in matters relating to land. The case to which I allude is recent, having occurred but a few days ago. A petition was presented by a gentleman from Vermont, signed by a number of persons, praying to be permitted to form a settlement on the public lands lying Northwest of the river Ohio. On a motion for referring it to a committee, a member from the same State rose and opposed the reference, assigning as a reason, that if the petition should so far receive the countenance of the House as to be referred, the petitioners would instantly commence the sale of rights. Now, if there are people so extremely ignorant as to purchase rights of this description, they certainly ought to be pitied. But will any person say that the present claimants belong to this class? No, sir; they are men experienced in business, by all accounts well versed in transactions relating to land, and as little liable to be imposed on as perhaps any equal number of persons that could be selected.

But it is said they could not have knowledge of the circumstances under which the act of Georgia of 1795 was passed; that they became purchasers before such information could possibly reach them. This certainly cannot be seriously insisted on. Will gentlemen look at the deeds conveying the titles, and then say the purchasers had no notice? Evidence, if not of the fraud, at least that there was something wrong in the business, is stamped on the very face of all the conveyances. In the report of the Commissioners it is stated "that all the deeds given by the companies, as well as the subsequent deeds, with only two or three exceptions, not only give a special instead of a general warrantee, but have also a special covenant, in the following words: 'And lastly, it is covenanted and expressly agreed and understood by and between the parties to these presents: that neither the grantors aforesaid, nor their heirs, executors, or administrators, shall be held to any other or further warrantee, than is hereinbefore expressed, nor liable to the refunding of any money in consequence of any defect in their title; from the State of Georgia. if any such hereafter there should appear to be.'" And this notice is rendered still more express and forcible by a reference to a proviso in the act of 1795, in the following words: "And provided further, that this State and the government thereof, shall at no time hereafter be subject to any suit at law or in equity, or claim or pretension whatever, for, or on account of any deductions in the quantity of the said territory, or for, or on account of the amount of the purchase-money to be paid as aforesaid, by any recovery which may or shall be had on any former claim or claims whatever." This clause is contained in a printed pamphlet laid on the table, which, though not official, is presumed to be correct. Surely it cannot be contended that such conveyances did not of themselves give sufficient notice that there was a risk, that there was a defect, or some imperfection in the title; and is Government now to be asked to insure against all risks of this description that adventurers, stimulated by an immoderate thirst of gain, may be disposed to run? I trust not.

Another reason suggested by the Commissioners in favor of a compromise, and on which great stress has been laid in this argument, is the tendency it is presumed it will have, to secure the tranquility of those who may hereafter inhabit that territory. If passing the resolution would produce that effect, I acknowledge the reason would be a powerful one. But what ground is there for believing that it would produce such effect? Can it be supposed, in the nature of things, that any men possessing a legal title for fifty millions of acres of land would surrender their rights, and accept of five millions? The supposition is too wild to obtain credit. The claimants, I take it, have something in view very different from a compromise. They will not give up their pursuit without a judicial decision. Conscious that their title will not stand the test, they want to fortify it by an act of the Legislature.

That this is their scheme, I infer not only from the nature of the case, but from a written document I hold in my hand, signed by a person styling himself the agent of the Tennessee Company. This memorial was laid on the table two years ago, but never having been withdrawn by the party, it is to be considered as expressive of their determination at this moment. This agent states that he considers the title of the company he represents to the lands they claim, as a good and sufficient title, and prays Congress to point out some mode by which they may be enabled to obtain an early judicial decision. This is the plan. Some of the claimants are to press for the act authorizing the compromise, but as some will refuse entering into it, none will consider themselves bound, and of course the act will remain unexecuted, but will be a great point gained by the claimants, inasmuch as they can plead it as an argument in favor of their title when it comes under legal discussion. This may happen when the Indian title to these lands is extinguished, and settlements are commenced under rights obtained from the United States. The claimants, if they see proper, may then bring their ejectments and obtain a trial.

The value of the land I consider as of no great importance. I have always viewed the whole cession as a bargain by no means favorable to the Government. In a pecuniary point of view I do not think it will be found so. Good policy, however, under existing circumstances, might have dictated the propriety of accepting it. My objections, therefore, do not depend on the value of the property or on any supposed injury or loss Government might sustain by giving it up. I am opposed, because I believe the resolution will fail in accomplishing the object intended to be produced by it; because I believe it will have an improper influence on judicial decisions, should such decisions ever be had on the case of the claimants, and because of the abhorrence I feel against the fraudulent and corrupt act under which the claimants pretend to derive their title. I cannot vote in favor of any measure that will have the appearance of giving any countenance or sanction to such an act. Under my present impressions, therefore, I must vote in favor of the amendment, and whether it succeeds or not, I shall ultimately vote against the whole resolution.

Mr. Root began by observing that he should not undertake a lengthy and elaborate discussion of the merits of this claim. He was not disposed minutely to inquire into the legality or equity of the claims derived under the act of Georgia of 1795. Although he believed that the New England purchasers were entitled to recover, both in law and in equity—that the fee of the lands in question was vested in them beyond any legislative control, yet as they had offered terms of compromise, and as gentlemen have inclined to put the issue upon the expediency of the measure, he should chiefly confine himself to the answering of such objections as he had heard offered in opposition to the claim. He said that he had listened attentively during this debate, and the first objection which possessed any claim to argument, fell from the first gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. J. RANDOLPH.) The objection is this: that the New England Company were purchasers with notice—that is, that they had notice of the fraud before they became purchasers; that they knew the sales by Georgia were void, and, purchasing with their eyes open, they must sustain the loss; and how, he inquired, has this notice been shown? By whom and on whom has it been served? The gentleman from Virginia who first spoke on this question has, to be sure, referred us to the President's Message of the 17th of February, 1795, and this he is pleased to denominate a notice. It may be a notice for aught I know, but surely it did not satisfy even Congress, much less the citizens of Boston, that the act of Georgia was passed in fraud, was ab initio void, or that a subsequent Legislature would annul the grant. That Message did notify Congress that Georgia had passed a law for selling a part of her vacant lands, and expressed some apprehensions for the future peace of the United States. [Here Mr. Root read the President's Message of the 17th February, 1795, and inferred, from the Message itself, that the President's apprehensions arose from the circumstance of that country's being inhabited by warlike Indians, and that he communicated the information to Congress in order that pacific measures might be adopted.] Is this, continued Mr. R., a notice of fraud? Is this a caveat to notify purchasers to beware? But, Mr. Speaker, is this Message interpreted into a notice of an adverse claim? If so, in whom did that adverse claim exist? Surely not in Georgia, after she had passed all her right. Did it exist in the United States? Such a claim was not asserted by the President in his Message. And indeed it appears, from a perusal of the bill reported by the select committee to whom that Message was referred, that no assertion of claim to the lands in question was then contemplated. [Mr. R. read the bill alluded to, purporting as follows: "Be it enacted, &c. that the President be authorized to obtain or accept, by purchase or donation, from the State of Georgia, a relinquishment and cession of the claim of the said State to the whole or any part of the lands lying within the limits of the same, and without the ordinary jurisdiction thereof."] Georgia owned other vacant lands, out of her ordinary jurisdiction, than those sold by her to the several companies of 1795. A cession of these lands to the United States appears to have been the object of that committee, and how could they have acted otherwise? It was known to the gentlemen composing that committee that Congress under the old Confederation, and since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, had repeatedly recognised the right of Georgia to the lands in question. Prior to the year 1788, Congress had, at three several times, requested the State of Georgia to cede a portion of her vacant territory to the United States. In that year the State of Georgia, by an act of her Legislature, authorized the delegates in Congress to cede and convey to the United States a portion of her vacant lands, including the same tract now claimed by the New England purchasers. This territory was to have been ceded, under certain restrictions and conditions, for a certain compensation, to be paid by the United States. Congress refused to accept of the cession, not because the lands were claimed by the United States, not from any supposed defect of title in Georgia, but because the terms were thought to be improper and inadmissible. And Congress thereupon, by another resolution, proposed to accept a cession of the lands in question, on other terms and under other conditions. [Here Mr. R. read copious extracts from the journals of the old Congress, to show the recognition of the right of Georgia to the lands now in controversy.] By several public acts and documents, continued Mr. R., have the Government of the United States, since that time, acknowledged and maintained the right of Georgia to these lands. The United States have also, by tacit consent, acknowledged the right of Georgia. That State, as early as the year 1780, asserted her claim by a public act of her Legislature. In 1789, she made a conditional sale of the same lands, and in 1795, by a legislative act, sold them to the several companies under which the New England purchasers claim to hold. No objection on the part of the United States was made to these several public acts, and, by a known rule of law, silence and acquiescence in such cases is tantamount to an express consent and confirmation. Under these circumstances I should hardly suppose that the President's Message amounted to a notice of an adverse claim. Another gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. CLARK,) alleging that "an actual notice is not necessary,"—that "a constructive notice is sufficient," which positions I shall not undertake to deny, has relied with much apparent confidence on the circumstance that the deed to the New England Company was executed on the same day that the rescinding act of Georgia was passed. He infers from this that the citizens of Boston must have known on the 13th of February, 1796, that the Legislature of Georgia were about to annul their grants, and pass their famed rescinding act on that day. We have not yet been told that that celebrated act was long in its passage through the different branches of the Legislature, nor have we any evidence to convince us that the effervescence, of which the gentleman speaks, flew like an electric shock almost instantaneously from Georgia to Massachusetts. It is fair to presume that the purchasers never conjectured that a rescinding act could be passed till after their contract was completed. The covenant for the purchase was entered into at Boston, in the month of September, 1795, between the agent of the original grantees and the New-England purchasers. In October, 1795, payment in full of the balance of the consideration money was made, and the Executive of Georgia made out his order for endorsing satisfaction on the mortgage, and for delivering up the same. The act of the Legislature of Georgia authorizing the grant, the deed executed by the Governor according to law, the certificate of the payment in full of the consideration money, and the Executive order for endorsing satisfaction on the mortgage, being all shown to the New England purchasers, could they believe that the grant was void? Bred to respect the acts of lawful authority, accustomed to repose confidence in the contracts of Government, and educated in the belief that private rights and private property would not be wantonly despoiled, they required some further notice of the fraud—at least of such fraud as might avoid the grant—than the mere surmises or whispers of the traveller. Thus, Mr. Speaker, I think this formidable notice results in this: that the President had been informed of the passage of the act of Georgia of 1795. He thought, unless precautionary steps were taken, that it might embroil us with the Indians, and deemed it proper to communicate the information to Congress.

Another objection is made by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. J. RANDOLPH) who first addressed you, that the claimants will perhaps reject the proffered compromise, and afterwards plead our own statute book as a recognition of their claim. This objection can easily be remedied in the bill to be passed pursuant to the resolution now under consideration. A proviso can, and undoubtedly will, be inserted, that in case a compromise shall not be effected, the act shall not be so construed as to impair the rights of the United States or to strengthen the title of the claimants.

Another objection, made by both of the gentlemen from Virginia, (Mr. J. RANDOLPH, and Mr. CLARK,) who have spoken in opposition to the resolution reported by the Committee of Claims, is, that nothing passed by the act of Georgia of 1795, and this objection is attempted to be supported—first, on the ground that the Legislature of Georgia had no authority to grant. I flatter myself, Mr. Speaker, that I have sufficiently shown that the lands in question were the property of Georgia as a free, sovereign, and independent State, and that she and she alone, had the right of their disposal. But a distinction is taken between the people and their Legislature. It is said that the people of Georgia had never delegated to the Legislature the right to dispose of her vacant lands. By the constitution of Georgia, all legislative powers were delegated to the Legislature, unless particularly excepted, and we do not learn that the power of disposing of their vacant territory was excepted or reserved. The disposition of vacant lands has always been considered legislative power, necessarily belonging to the Legislature, without any express delegation in a constitution. If such delegation of power is necessary, I imagine that but few valid grants can be found in the several States. In support of this objection it is further insisted, that the grant of 1795 was fraudulent—of course, that it is void ab initio. The abominable fraud, the gross and odious corruption, which is said to have been practised by, and upon the members of the granting Legislature of 1795, have been depicted in the most artful and detestable colors. But even were I to admit for a moment, that the motives of a Legislature can be questioned in order to nullify their acts, I should extremely doubt whether that abom-nable corruption did even exist to the extent alleged. Where, let me ask, is the proof of its existence? I can find it nowhere except in ex parte affidavits, taken before no one knows whom, and sworn to by persons equally strangers to us. Being voluntary affidavits, the deponents felt perfectly secure from the pains and penalties of wilful and corrupt perjury. If these legislators were so base and impure, why have they not been arraigned to answer for their crimes? We have heard of no prosecution against them for the bribery and corruption. Instead of jails, gibbets, and infamy, they have been rewarded by the continued confidence, not only of the people, but of the Legislature. Several of the members who stand charged with bribery, have since been elected by the people to seats in both branches of their Legislature. Several others have since been appointed by the Legislature to seats on the bench of justice, and one other has since been appointed by legislative act, a trustee of the University of Georgia. Can we believe, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Georgia are so lost to every principle of virtue as to elect men stained with corruption and stamped with infamy, to fill seats in the Legislative body? Can we believe that the Legislature are so shameless as to defile the sacred bench of justice with such impurity and fraud? And, last of all, can you believe that she would commit the care of the education of her youth to the very child of corruption? No sir, it cannot be! I cannot believe that this transaction is so vile as it has been represented. This objection is still further supported by another gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. CLARK,) by a recurrence to that "effervescence," which induced the people to "rise in the majesty of their strength and declare the act null and void." It is true, sir, that the people, or rather their Legislature, became so effervescent in 1796, as to rise in the majesty of their strength and kindle a bonfire. Disregarding the sacred nature of contracts, setting at defiance the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "no State shall pass any ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts," and that "full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State," and sporting with the rights of innocent individuals, that Legislature erected the funeral pyre, bound the helpless victim, and laid it upon the altar. Then, not like the patriarchs of old who laid coals upon the altar, they sacrilegiously called down the fire of heaven to aid in the destructive work. This contract was wedded to the Constitution of the United States, and when the latter was about to perish by the hands of Georgia legislators, the former, like a Hindoo spouse, must perish by the same flames, that their ashes might be mingled and gathered in the same urn. But to complete the scene of solemn mockery, a convention was called who ingrafted the rescinding act into their constitution. This effort to give strength to invalidity was equally unavailing. That contract was made under the sanction and authority of the Constitution of the United States, and this Constitution, which forbids a State to impair a contract, also declares that, "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby; anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

Another objection made by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. CLARK,) is, that the price was so inadequate as to evidence the invalidity of the title. The price, Mr. Speaker, although apparently inadequate, was, under all circumstances, equal or nearly equal to what had been paid for large tracts sold by other States.

This country was remote, and then owned and inhabited by warlike tribes of Indians. The Spaniards were on its border, and a part of it was actually occupied by settlers under Spanish and British grants. Yet the New England purchasers paid nearly double the price for which the delightful country of the Tennessee was sold. And, by a known rule in chancery, if a contract equal at its creation, afterwards becomes unequal, still execution will be decreed. I perfectly agree with the gentleman that persons ought to come "with clean hands and pure hearts," to seek for justice; and I also agree in another maxim, that the hands of the claimants are presumed to be clean, and their hearts presumed to be pure, until the contrary be shown. They allege to be innocent purchasers—show that they are otherwise before you brand them with infamy.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. LUCAS) has objected that the Legislature of Georgia were deceived in the quantity of land by them sold, and refers to the commissioners' report, by which it appears that the country sold contains nearly double the amount of acres which it was supposed to contain at the time of the sale. Shall this pretence vitiate the contract? Are we to suppose that men selected from all parts of the State, possessed less knowledge of her vacant territory than purchasers at a distance? Shall the merchant absolve himself from his contract by saying that he was cheated in the bale of goods which he had sold, and which, for a long time, he had under his eye? Will it avail the vender to say, sir, you have cheated me in the worth of the horse I sold you, and which I had used for a long time? The lands in question were unascertained. The quantity was equally unknown to the vendors and to the vendees; of course no fraud can be imputed to the transaction on that score.

The same gentleman from Pennsylvania, and he is joined by his colleague (Mr. GREGG) and by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. CLARK,) object to this claim on the ground that the deed to the New England purchasers contains a covenant of special and not of general warranty. Thence they infer, that these purchasers might presume that the act was fraudulent, and would be rescinded. In my opinion that inference cannot fairly be derived from the premises. The granting Legislature of Georgia, being ignorant of the extent of former grants, as well as of the quantity of acres in that tract of country, very properly provided that the State should not be subject to any suit, claim, or pretension, on account of any deduction in the quantity of said territory. The limits between the United States and the King of Spain were not at that time definitively settled. Hence the propriety of the special covenant, that the Georgia companies should not be liable to refund to the New England purchasers any money in consequence of any defect in their title from the State of Georgia. They knew, and were willing to encounter, these hazards, but they had been too much accustomed to yield confidence in Legislative contracts to believe that they would be wantonly violated.

Mr. Speaker, I have attempted, as far as my feeble abilities would permit, to answer all the objections I recollect to have heard against this claim, and which appear to possess the merit of argument. If I have been successful, I trust the House will pardon me in declaring that I believe the claimants are not only equitably but legally entitled to the relief which they ask. That Georgia had the right to convey, I think cannot be doubted. And even admitting, for argument's sake, that the original sale was fraudulent and void, and that it is competent to a legislative or a judiciary tribunal to inquire into the motives which influenced a prior Legislature in making a contract, still the purchase is good in the hands of subsequent purchasers who come in for valuable consideration and without notice of the fraud; and the subsequent purchasers would more especially be protected against an after purchaser who purchased from the first grantor, and with notice of the prior grant. The United States have purchased of Georgia, with notice that that State had, years before, sold the same lands to certain companies, and that those companies had sold to the present claimants; and shall the United States avoid the first contract as fraudulent? The law books contain no such doctrine.

But suppose, sir, that the act of Georgia of 1795, was stamped with infamy, was generated in corruption, so that no subsequent transfer could cleanse it of the foul stain, still let me ask, would it not be wise, would it not be prudent, to effect a compromise with these claimants? This tract of country is now estimated at about fifty millions of acres. It is not proposed, and indeed we are not permitted by the convention with Georgia, to allow more than five millions of acres to all the different claimants, in consideration of their relinquishment of claim to the forty-five millions of acres. If their claim is a bad one it would be for the advantage of the United States to give ten per cent. for its extinction. Suppose the Indian title to that country was extinguished, and a land office was opened, would the industrious settler pay you as much for that land, with this claim impending over it, as he would for the same land if it were free from all conflicting claims? If he would, in the latter case, pay you two dollars an acre, which is the medium price for which the United States lands are sold, would he give you one dollar and eighty cents an acre, knowing that he must encounter a law-suit? No, sir; industrious farmers are unwilling to purchase a law-suit. That country will never be sold to actual settlers until these claims shall be extinguished or confirmed.

Having offered my sentiments in opposition to the amendment, and in favor of the resolution reported by the Committee of Claims, I confess, Mr. Speaker, that I feel myself not a little embarrassed. I feel myself in an awful dilemma. I feel that I am reduced to a sad, a desperate alternative. I must either acknowledge that I have been bribed, that I am base and corrupt, or, what is almost equally terrible to my feelings, that I have leagued in sentiment with the gentlemen on this side the House, (pointing to the Federal gentlemen.) Unwilling to acknowledge myself corrupt, or that I have been influenced by any circumstance without these walls, I think it justice to myself to declare that neither myself nor any of my connexions, nor any of my constituents, within my knowledge, ever claimed a single foot of this land. If, therefore, I am influenced on this occasion by impure or unworthy motives, it must be by a direct bribe. Unwilling to acknowledge this, I am driven to the other alternative, however painful that election must be, and must acknowledge myself a Federalist. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. J. RANDOLPH) does not hesitate to denounce to the people all those republican members who dare to think differently from him on this question, as having been bribed or as having gone over to the Federalists. This denunciation is just cause of alarm to all those who, like myself, give their votes according to their own judgment, on the best reflection and most mature deliberation. Coming from that gentleman, it almost astonishes me. To me it appears as terrible as the thunders of Olympus. I fear I shall sink under its weight.

Mr. Speaker, I still entertain a gleam of hope, that my constituents will pardon my presumption in daring to differ from that gentleman in sentiment on this occasion—that they may yet think that I may still be a Republican, although I decline to follow in the servile track of any particular popular leader. This denunciation and proscription of Republican members on this floor, is truly alarming. It is equally alarming to reflect that those gentlemen who have shared the public confidence in the republican districts of the Union, are now declared to be polluted by the embrace of speculators, and are henceforth to be considered as destitute of every moral virtue. If this be true, if the eighth Congress of the United States have such men among them, if corruption already proceeds from your Executive departments, then, indeed, have we arrived to an awful crisis. If this monstrous enormity is practised upon the Republican members of this House, then the whole Republican system of our Government totters to its base. But, sir, these suggestions are but the fantasies of a wild imagination, the chimeras of a heated brain. Before the cool and dispassionate judgment of a discerning mind, they "dissipate into thin air." That officer, in one of the great Executive departments of our Government, to whom the gentleman alludes, I presume is the Postmaster General. That valuable officer is represented as the basest of men, wielding his monstrous engine of patronage and influence for the wicked purposes of corruption. Base as he is said to be, I am proud to say that, for more than ten years past, I have had the honor of his acquaintance. I believe him to be as good, as upright, and as honest a man as any of those other valuable characters who now, happily for our country, preside over the great Executive departments of our Government. His character stands superior to the obloquy of the gentleman from Virginia. That gentleman's denunciations cannot overthrow or destroy him, while talents and integrity are considered as deserving of public esteem and confidence. He is too firmly fixed in the esteem and affections of the people in the eastern section of the Union; his character is too strongly surrounded by the ramparts of virtue, to be shaken by the artillery of that gentleman. Envy may lift her pallid front in vain, the well-earned fame of the Postmaster General will prove an invulnerable shield against her envenomed shafts, and they will fall harmless at his feet.

I hope the gentleman from Virginia will learn, after this, that members are not to be diverted from their object by his threats, and that he will cease to amuse this House with such declamation.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said, that, as well as his extreme indisposition and excessive hoarseness would permit, he would lay before the House some observations on the various objections which had been urged against the amendment of his worthy and respectable colleague, (Mr. CLARK,) for such he was in every point of view. He complained of disingenuous and unfair practices on the part of some of his opponents. They had undertaken to argue, upon a supposed admission of his friend and himself, that the act of 1795 created a contract between the State of Georgia and the grantees therein named. This (said he) is nothing less than begging, or rather, a flagrant robbery of the question. We deny that any contract has been, or could be made under such circumstances—that fraud is a basis on which a contract can be erected. Gentlemen must drive into this morass of corruption, piles of stronger argument and sounder reasoning, before they can build a Stadt-house of a conclusion upon it. It is a quagmire over which they cannot pass; and in their awkward attempts to get round it, they confess, even whilst they effect to deny its existence. Fraud has rendered it without bottom. The act of 1796, is at once declaratory of that fraud, and the highest possible evidence of the fact. The claimants and their advocates themselves concede it, when they cling to the report of the commissioners, by which it is expressly affirmed, and which explicitly declares, that their title cannot be supported. And when they come into this House with that report in their hands, and whine and cringe for our bounty, do they not abandon all pretensions to title? Yes, the advocates of these claims are compelled to acknowledge the fraud, and yield the ground of contract. How else can they justify their own fraud and injustice in stripping fair contractors, with a good title, of seven-eighths of their rightful and bona fide purchase? This point cannot be kept too much in sight, nor too strongly insisted on.

The venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. FINDLEY,) when he gave in his recantation of his last year's opinions on this subject, told you that General Washington's Message had no reference to the fraudulency of the act of 1795. He considered it as a caveat on behalf of the United States, who claimed a great part of the territory in question. Be it so. Was that notice to subsequent purchasers, or not? How will gentleman reconcile this inconsistency? Within the disputed limits between the Federal Government and Georgia, five-sixths of this very New England Company's purchase were comprised, besides that valuable part of the Georgia Company's grant contained in the fork of the Alabama and Tombigbee. The United States contended, that the country west of the Chatahoochee, and south of a parallel of latitude which should intersect the mouth of the Yazoo river, never constituted a part of Georgia—that it was within the limits of the province of West Florida, from which being severed, by the peace of 1783, it became vested in the Confederacy, and not in the State to which it happened to be contiguous. The far greater part of the grant to the Georgia Mississippi Company is embraced within these limits: the purchase of the New England Company is stated, by themselves, to have been made from that company, twelve months after the President's Message. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, himself, considers this Message as a formal annunciation of the adverse claim of the United States to the land in question, and, in the same breath, avers that the New England company, subsequent purchasers of that very land, were ignorant of any defect of title in the State of Georgia, or the grantees under her. How will he reconcile this?

The same gentleman has introduced into this debate, the names of two persons; one of them, at that time, a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, the other a Senator from the State of Georgia; who, he tells us, were deeply concerned in the transaction of 1795. Both these gentlemen are no more. Private character, always dear, always to be respected, seems almost canonized by the grave. When men go hence, their evil deeds should follow them, and, for me, might sleep oblivious in their tomb. But if the mouldering ashes of the dead are to be raked up, let it not be for the furtherance of injustice. In every stage of this discussion, whilst I have kept my eye steadily fixed on the enormity of the act of 1795, I have lost sight of the agents. Since, however, some of them have been mentioned, it may not be immaterial to notice the interest which they took in this business. It is too true, sir, that the Senator in question was one of the fathers of the act of 1795. By the Assembly which passed it he was, at the same session, re-elected to the Senate of the United States for six years thereafter. It is equally true, Mr. Speaker, that the notorious British Treaty was ratified by that Senator's casting vote. And as the Yazoo speculation then carried through the British Treaty, now it seems, the adherents of that treaty are to drag the Yazoo speculation out of the mire. The connexion of the two questions at that day is too notorious to be denied. That very Senator, were he now here, would disdain to deny it. With all his faults, he was a man of some noble qualities. Hypocrisy, at least, was not in the catalogue of his vices. The coupling together of the British Treaty and the Yazoo business, cannot surely be unknown to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He was a member of the House of Representatives which voted the appropriation for carrying that treaty into effect, and is understood to have acted a conspicuous part on the occasion. Can it be matter of surprise that the same Senate that ratified the British Treaty by the casting vote of one of the principal grantees of the act of Georgia of 1795, should refuse to co-operate with the House of Representatives, in measures for obviating the mischiefs of that act? When you see this corruption extending itself to two great departments of Government, can you wonder at the bitterness of its fruit? With their leaders in the Legislature and on the judgment seat, well might the host of corruption feel confident in their strength; even yet they have scarcely laid aside their audacity.

A gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. EUSTIS,) has said, that the claimants from his State had no notice of the fraud; "that he knows they had not;" I cannot have mistaken him, for I took down the words. Sir, I would ask that gentleman, whence arises the proverbial difficulty of providing a negative, but from the difficulty of knowing one?

[Mr. EUSTIS rose to explain. If he had said that he knew the claimants had not a knowledge of the fraud, he had said too much. It was impossible that any one should know all that was known or passing in the mind of another. Without recollecting the precise words used, he had intended to state his own belief that they had no such knowledge or information. He was resident and conversant with those concerned in the transaction, it was the subject of general conversation, and if there had been any knowledge or report of the kind, he thought it must have come to his knowledge; but he also recollected to have stated at the time that this circumstance did not depend on the knowledge or opinion of any individual—as the price paid for the land precluded any idea or belief that the purchasers could have had any knowledge of the fraud.]

Mr. RANDOLPH resumed. The facts which I am about to mention are derived from such a source that I could almost pledge myself for their truth: When the agent of the Georgia Mississippi Company (under whom the New England Land Company claim) arrived in the Eastern States, he had great difficulty in disposing of his booty. The rumor of the fraud by which it was acquired had gone before him. People did not like to vest their money in this new Mississippi scheme. He accordingly applied to some leading men of wealth and intelligence, offering to some as high as 200,000 acres, to others less, for which they were neither to pay money, nor pass their paper, but were to stand on his books as purchasers at so much per acre. These were the decoy-birds to bring the ducks and geese into the net of speculation. On the faith of these persons, under the idea that men of their information would not risk such vast sums without some prospect of return, others resolved to venture, and gambled in this new land fund, laid out their money in the Yazoo lottery and have drawn blanks. And these, sir, are the innocent purchasers by whom we are beset; purchasers without price, who never paid a shilling, and never can be called upon for one; the vile panders of speculation. And in what do their dupes differ from the losers in any other gambling or usurious transaction? The premium was proportioned to the risk. As well may your buyers and sellers of stock, your bulls and your bears of the alley, require indemnification for their losses at the hands of the nation. There is another fact, too little known, but unquestionably true, in relation to this business. This scheme of buying up the Western Territory of Georgia did not originate there. It was hatched in Philadelphia and New York, (and I believe Boston; of this, however, I am not positive,) and the funds with which it was effected were principally furnished by moneyed capitalists in those towns. The direction of these resources devolved chiefly on the Senator who has been mentioned. Too wary to commit himself to writing, he and his associates agreed upon a countersign. His re-election to the Senate was to be considered as evidence that the temper of the Legislature of Georgia was suited to their purpose, and his Northern confederates were to take their measures accordingly. In proof of this fact, no sooner was the news of his reappointment announced at New York, than it was publicly said in a coffee-house there, "then the Western Territory of Georgia is sold." Does this require a comment? Do you not see the strong probability that many of those, who now appear in the character of purchasers from the original grantees named in the act of 1795, are in fact partners, perhaps instigators and prime movers of a transaction in which their names do not appear? Amidst such a complication of guilt, how are you to discriminate; how fix the Proteus? The chairman of the Committee of Claims, who brought in this report, under the lash of whose criticism we have all so often smarted, that he is generally known as the pedagogue of the House, will give me leave on this subject to refer him to an authority. It is one with which he is no doubt familiar, and, however humble, well disposed to respect. The authority which I am about to cite is Dillworth's Spelling Book, and if it will be more grateful to the gentleman, not our common American edition, but the Royal English Spelling Book. In one of the chapters of that useful elementary work it is related, that two persons going into a shop on pretence of purchase, one of them stole a piece of goods and handed it to the other to conceal under his cloak. When challenged with the theft, he who stole it said he had it not, and he who had it said he did not take it. Gentlemen, replied the honest tradesman, what you say may all be very true, but, at the same time, I know that between you I am robbed. And such precisely is our case. But I hope, sir, we shall not permit the parties, whether original grantees who took it, or subsequent purchasers who have it, to make off with the public property.

The rigor of the Committee of Claims has passed into a proverb. It has more than once caused the justice of this House to be questioned. What, then, was our surprise on reading their report, to find that they have discovered "Equity" in the pretensions of these petitioners. Sir, when the war-worn soldier of the Revolution, or the desolate widow and famished offspring of him who sealed your independence with his blood, ask at the door of that Committee for bread, they receive the statute of limitation. On such occasions you hear of no equity in the case. Their claims have not the stamp and seal of iniquity upon them. Summum jus is the measure dealt out to them. The equity of the Committee is reserved for those claims which are branded with iniquity and stamped with infamy. This reminds me of the story of a poor, distressed female in London applying for admittance into the Magdalen Charity. Being asked who she was, her wretched tale was told in a few words—"I am poor, innocent, and friendless." "Unhappy girl, replied the director, your case does not come within the purview of this institution. Innocence has no admission here; this is a place of reception for prostitutes; you must go and qualify yourself before you can partake of our relief." With equal discretion the directors of the Committee of Claims suffer nothing to find support in their asylum but what is tainted with corruption, and stamped with fraud. Give it these properties and they will give it "equity."

But we are told that the United States gave even less for these lands than the price paid by the several companies of 1795. Admitting the fact, (which is unquestionably false,) did Georgia sell to the Union for pounds, shillings and pence? Did North Carolina and Virginia, in their acts of cession of even more extensive countries, look to pecuniary profit? Are we become so grovelling that public spirit and the general good, go for nothing? The money which we engaged to pay out of the proceeds of the land, although more than double the amount paid by the four companies in 1795 constitutes but a small part even of the pecuniary consideration. We are, moreover, pledged to the extinguishment of the Indian title to an immense territory within the present limits of Georgia. It has been whispered in my ear that the fate of a late treaty with the Creeks is to depend on the decision of this question, and as the British Treaty and the Yazoo were made to stand or fall together in 1795, so the Creek Treaty and the Yazoo are to stand or fall together in 1805. But those who hold out this threat to the members from Georgia, should know them better, should be told that they are made of the sternest stuff of republicanism, and can neither be coaxed nor intimidated out of their principles. Of those who talk of the Western lands being acquired for nothing, I would ask if that be an argument for throwing them away upon flagitious men? But were the toils, and dangers, and treasures of the Revolution nothing? The bloody battles, the burning and devastations of the Southern and Western countries? Was the expedition of the brave and intrepid Clarke, which wants only a Polybius to rival the march of Thrasymene; were the exploits of this American Hannibal, who secured the Western country to you, nothing? Were your Indian wars and massacres nothing?

This Government, let me remind you, has acquired the confidence of the public by the disinterestedness of its measures. The repeal of the internal taxes is not the least conspicuous among them. How long will you retain that well-earned confidence, if you lavish on a band of speculators a landed capital whose annual interest is more than equivalent to the whole proceeds of those taxes? I will not go into petty details now, but I pledge myself that, whoever makes the calculation, will find the value of the land, together with the expense of extinguishing the Indian title, at the rate of our last treaty in that quarter, to yield a clear perpetual annuity, equal to the receipt from the internal taxes. What would you say to a proposition to revive those taxes and mortgage them for the payment of the interest on a Yazoo stock? Do you wonder that we shrink from such a precipice? Shall a republican House of Representatives sanction this wanton waste of the public resources to nourish the bane of every Republic? Are you simple enough to believe that the five millions will quiet them? Yes, as the tribute of the Roman world satisfied their barbarian enemies. You only whet their appetite and increase their means for extorting more. Like the Gauls, after the sack of Rome, they will make their second attempt upon the Capitol, before they have divided the plunder acquired in the first. When I see the formidable front displayed by this band of broken speculators, I am irresistibly impelled to inquire, what would have been their force if their attempt on the western country of Georgia had not been baffled by the virtue and patriotism of that State? What is there in this Government that could have coped with them? Sir, you must have built another wing to your Capitol, for the third branch of your Legislature. You would have had a Yazoo estate in your empire, not with a qualified negative, but an absolute veto on all your proceedings. Scarcely would they have left you the initiative.

I have said, and I repeat it, that the aspect in which this thing presents itself, would, alone, determine me to resist it. In one of the petitioners I behold an Executive officer, who receives and distributes a yearly revenue of $300,000, yielding scarcely any net profit to Government. Offices in his disposal to the annual amount of $94,000, and contracts more lucrative making up the residue of the sum. A patronage limited only by the extent of our country. Is this right? Is it even decent? Shall political power be made the engine of private interest? Shall such a suspicion tarnish your proceedings? How would you receive a petition from the President of the United States, if such a thing can be supposed possible? Sir, I wish to see the same purity pervading every subordinate branch of administration, which, I am persuaded, exists in its great departments.— Shall persons holding appointments under the great and good man, who presides over our councils, draw on the rich fund of his well-earned reputation, to eke out their flimsy and scanty pretensions? Is the relation in which they stand to him, to be made the cloak and cover of their dark designs? To the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Root,) who takes fire at every insinuation against his friend, I have only to observe, on this subject, that what I dare to say, I dare to justify. To the House I will relate an incident, from which it may judge how far I have lightly conceived or expressed an opinion to the prejudice of any man. I owe an apology to my informant for making public what he certainly did not authorize me to reveal. There is no reparation which can be offered by one gentleman and accepted by another, that I shall not be ready to make him; but I feel myself already justified to him, since he sees the circumstances under which I act. A few evenings since, a profitable contract for carrying the mail was offered to a friend of mine who is a member of this House. You must know, sir, that the person so often alluded to maintains a jack-all, fed, not (as you would suppose) upon the offal of contract, but with the fairest pieces in the shambles; and, at night, when honest men are in bed, does this obscene animal prowl through the streets of this vast and desolate city, seeking whom he may tamper with. Well, sir, when this worthy plenipotentiary had made his proposal, in due form, the independent man to whom it was addressed, saw at once its drift. "Tell your principal, said he, that I will take his contract, but I shall vote against the Yazoo claim, notwithstanding." Next day, he was told that there had been some misunderstanding of the business, that he could not have the contract, as it was previously bespoken by another!

Sir, I well recollect, when first I had the honor of a seat in this House, we were members then of a small minority; a poor, forlorn hope; that this very petitioner appeared in Philadelphia, on behalf of another great land company on Lake Erie. He then told us, as an inducement to vote for the Connecticut reserve (as it was called) that if that measure failed, it would ruin the republicans and the cause in that State. You, sir, cannot have forgotten the reply he received: "That we did not understand the republicanism that was to be 'paid for; that we feared it was not of the right sort, but spurious.'" And, having maintained our principles through the ordeal of that day, shall we now abandon them, to act with the men and upon the maxims which we then abjured? Shall we now condescend to means which we disdained to use in the most desperate crisis of our political fortune? This is, indeed, the age of monstrous coalitions; and this corruption has the quality of cementing the most inveterate enmities, personal as well as political. It has united in close concert those, of whom it has been said, not in the figurative language of prophecy, but in the sober narrative of history: "I have bruised thy head, and thou hast bruised my heel." Such is the description of persons who would present to the President of the United States an act to which when he puts his hand, he signs a libel on his whole political life. But he will never tarnish the unsullied lustre of his fame; he will never sanction the monstrous position, (for such it is, dress it up as you will.) "that a legislator may sell his vote, and a right, which cannot be divested, will pass under such sale." Establish this doctrine, and there is an end of representative Government; from that moment republicanism receives its death-blow.

The feeble cry of Virginian influence and ambitious leaders, is attempted to be raised. If such insinuations were worthy of reply, I might appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, for the fact, that no man in this House, (yourself, perhaps, excepted.) is oftener in a minority than I am. If by a leader he meant one who speaks his opinion freely and boldly; who claims something of that independence of which the gentleman from New York so loudly vaunts; who will not connive at public robbery, be the robbers whom they may, then the imputation may be just; such is the nature of my ambition; but, in the common acceptance of words, nothing can be more false. In the coarse, language of the proverb, 'tis the still sow that sucks the draft." No, sir, we are not the leaders. There they sit, and well they know it, forcing down our throats the most obnoxious measures. Gentlemen may be silent, but they shall be dragged into public view. If they direct our councils at least let them answer for the result. We will not be responsible for their measures. If we do not hold the reins we will not be accountable for the accidents which may befall the carriage.

But, sir, I am a denunciator! Of whom? Of the gentlemen on my left? Not at all; but of those men and their principles whom the people themselves have denounced: on whom they have burnt their indelible curse, deep and lasting as the lightning of Heaven. But, you are told, not to regard such idle declamation. I would remind the gentleman from New York that, if to declaim be not to reason, so neither is it to be argumentative to be dull. Warmth is the creature of the heart, not of the head. A position, in itself just, can lose no part of its truth from the manner in which it is uttered, whether by the driest and most stupid special pleader, or bellowed with the lungs of a Stentor. Are our opponents ashamed of their cause, that they devolve its defence on the little ones by whom we are beset?

Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that we should not be content to live upon the principal of our popularity; that we should go on to deserve the public confidence and the disapprobation of the gentleman over the way. But, if everything is to be reversed, if official influence is to become the handmaid of private interest, if the old system is to be revived with the old men, or any that can be picked up, I may deplore the defection, but never will I cease to stigmatize it. Never shall I hesitate between any minority, far less that in which I now find myself, and such a majority as is opposed to us. I took my degrees, sir, in this House, in a minority, much smaller, indeed, but of the same stamp. A minority, whose every act bore the test of rigorous principle, and with them to the last I will exclaim, fiat justitia, ruat cælum.

The Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 1.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with the desire of the House of Representatives, expressed in their resolution of yesterday, I have to inform them that, by a letter of the thirtieth of May last, from the Secretary of War to Samuel Hammond, a member of the House, it was proposed to him to accept a commission of Colonel Commandant for the District of Louisiana, when the new Government there should commence. By a letter of the thirtieth of June, he signified a willingness to accept; but still more definitively by one of October twenty-sixth, a copy of which is, therefore, now communicated. A commission had been made out for him, bearing date the first day of October last, and forwarded before the receipt of his letter of October twenty-sixth. No later communication has been received from him, nor is anything later known of his movements.

JAN. 31, 1805.

TH. JEFFERSON.

The said Message, and the copy of the letter referred to therein, were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a report, and two statements, marked A and B, exhibiting the tonnage of vessels paying foreign duties, entered into the several ports of the United States, during the years 1801, 1802, 1803; and of light money collected in the several ports of the United States, from the first of July to the thirtieth of September 1804; prepared in obedience to a resolution of this House, of the twenty-third ultimo; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

For some weeks past, I have had reason to expect, by every mail from New Orleans, information which would have fully met the views of the House of Representatives, expressed in their resolution of December thirty-first, on the subject of a post road from the city of Washington to New Orleans; but this being not yet received, I think it my duty, without further delay, to communicate to the House the information I possess, however imperfect.

tion at Natchez, and apprized of the anxiety existing to have a practicable road explored for forwarding the mail to New Orleans, without crossing the mountains, offered his services, voluntarily, to return by the route contemplated, taking, as he should go, such observations of longitude and latitude as would enable him to delineate it exactly, and, by protraction, to show of what shortenings it would admit. The offer was accepted, and he was furnished with an accurate sextant for his observations. The route proposed was from Washington by Fredericksburg, Cartersville, Lower Sauratown, Salisbury, Franklin Court House, in Georgia, Tuckabachee, Fort Stoddert, and the mouth of Pearl River, to New Orleans. It is believed he followed this route generally, deviating at times only, for special purposes, and returning again into it. His letters, herewith communicated, will show his opinion to have been, after completing his journey, that the practicable distance between Washington and New Orleans will be a little over one thousand miles. He expected to forward his map and special report, within one week from the date of his last letter; but a letter of December tenth, from another person, informs me he had been unwell, but would forward them within a week from that time. So soon as they shall be received, they shall be communicated to the House of Representatives.

TH. JEFFERSON.

FEBRUARY 1, 1805.

The said Message was read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom was committed, on the seventh of December last, a motion respecting "the establishment of a post road from Knoxville, in the State of Tennessee, to the settlements on the Tombigbee river, in the Mississippi Territory, and from thence to New Orleans; also for the establishment of a post road from—, in Georgia, to the said settlement on the Tombigbee, to intersect the former road, at the most convenient point between Knoxville and the Tombigbee."

A petition of the people called Quakers, inhabitants of the State of Ohio, and parts adjacent, signed by order and in behalf of the society of the said people called Quakers, by Horton Howard and Nathan Updegraff, was presented to the House and read, praying a right in fee simple, at the usual price and credit, in the purchase of certain sections of land therein specified, or such other sections, in the ranges of townships within the said State, as Congress, in their wisdom, shall deem reasonable and proper; to be appropriated by the petitioners to promote the laudable purpose of instructing the youth of the society aforesaid, as well as those who may be interested therein, in the progress of useful literature, and of piety and virtue.—Referred to the committee appointed, the seventh ultimo, "to inquire whether any, and, if any, what alterations are necessary in the laws providing for the sale of the public lands Northwest of the Ohio;" that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

POSTMASTER GENERAL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter from Gideon Granger, Postmaster General of the United States:

FEBRUARY 1, 1805.

HON. NATHANIEL MACON, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

SIR: I have received information, from various sources, that both my public and private character and conduct have been arraigned on the floor of the House of Congress by a member of that House, in a debate of the 29th, and in another of the 31st ultimo, in a case where no examination of my official conduct was proposed. As there is not, within my knowledge, any instance of a similar abuse offered to an officer of Government, I know not of any precedent whereby to regulate my conduct. I wish at all times, and more especially on an occasion so extraordinary and unprecedented, to approach the Representatives of the nation with all that respect and regard to which they are entitled. My feelings do not allow me, at present, to exercise that coolness and judgment which I might call to my aid in a case less interesting.

Conscious of the purity of my conduct, and that no charge can be made or supported against me consistent with truth and justice, it is a duty which I owe to my country—to the Government which has confided in me—to myself and my family—to declare (and I do now most solemnly declare) that every charge or insinuation which has been made against my private or public character, or against my fairness and impartiality, or of my attempting by bribery, or in any improper manner, to influence any member of Congress upon any question pending before that honorable body, is absolutely and altogether untrue, and founded at least in error only.

The high respect due to your body and every member of it during your sessions, will not allow me to hazard a conjecture as to the motives of the gentleman who has proclaimed these charges.

I court and solicit of Congress an investigation into my official (and if they please my private) conduct, from the first moment the Post Office Department was committed to my charge to the present period. Nor have I any favor to ask, save only this, that an investigation may be had the present session.

I pray you to communicate this to the House of Representatives; and I tender to that honorable body, and to you, their Speaker, the assurance of my high esteem and respect.

GIDEON GRANGER.*

Mr. VARNUM moved that the letter of the Postmaster General be referred to a select committee to inquire into the subject.

Mr. NELSON hoped the motion would not prevail, as no good purpose could be answered by the

* On the 7th February following, Mr. Granger addressed the annexed explanatory letter to the Speaker:

WASHINGTON CITY, Feb. 7, 1805.

SIR: My sole object in addressing to Congress my letter of the first of the present month was to gain an opportunity of refuting the charges and insinuations which had been made against me. The little reflection I could give the subject induced me to believe that it was proper, in a respectful manner, to repel the charges publicly, and in the place where they were made. Nor did it occur to me that the right of an officer to defend his character depended upon the office he happened to hold.

If, however, I erred in this, I presume it cannot be wrong, in defence of my reputation, to address you in inquiry. It appeared to him to be an affair of honor between two gentlemen, and Congress had nothing to do with it. If, upon investigation, the charges were found to be true, Congress had no power to remove the Postmaster General from office. For what purpose, then, were they to waste the time of the House in such an inquiry? That was not the proper place to make the application; it should have been made to the President, if made at all, as he had the power of removing officers. The session was far advanced and limited in its duration. A variety of important business still remained unfinished, and he feared some of it would remain so; yet, notwithstanding, the House was called upon to take up private quarrels between gentlemen. He hoped the motion would not prevail, and that the gentlemen would be left to settle the dispute themselves.

Mr. BRYAN called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ELLIOT.—This House was informed by a member, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) in language too strong to be misunderstood, that corruption had found your private character as a gentleman. I will own that I am desirous of retaining your friendship and confidence. I will own that I am not indifferent to public opinion, and that I seek the confidence and esteem of my fellow-citizens by the even tenor of a well-spent life, and a regular discharge of all the social duties—not by lessening the esteem and confidence to which others are entitled.

Various charges have been made against me for the interest I have in the Georgia grants—for my being an agent of the New England Company, and for my conduct as such agent. As these charges have not yet appeared in print, I cannot give that specific answer which may hereafter become necessary, and for which I pledge myself to the public, in case such necessity should exist.

I now take the liberty of stating how I became interested in the claims—how the agency was accepted, and what has been my conduct as agent.

First, as to my interest.

When the members of the New England Company formed their contract with William Williamson, as agent for the Georgia Mississippi Company, in September, 1795, I had not the least interest in the concern. Upon the advice of my friends, and at their solicitation, between that period and the first of December, I agreed to become interested, and accepted of a certain share, which was procured for me by a voluntary relinquishment of a part by several gentlemen for that purpose. In January, 1796, the agents came on from Georgia to give the conveyance, and I was deputed as agent for many of the proprietors near Connecticut river; to discharge which trust I proceeded to Boston. Before the business was closed my principals arrived; a variety of considerations induced me to relinquish the adventure, such as the difference of climate, the distance of the property, the warlike habits of the natives, and the want of capital, and before the time of which I am about to speak, I relinquished my right to two friends from Connecticut. Thus my concern with the Georgia lands, as I thought, was closed forever. But on the evening of the Sunday next preceding the second Tuesday of February, 1796, Ashbel Stanley, then of Coventry, in Connecticut, applied to Oliver Phelps, Esq., and myself, and requested us to become surety for him and Jeremiah Ripley, Esq., of said Coventry, (they being partners in trade,) to the Georgia agents, for the space of sixty days, to the amount of $75,000, and assigned for reason that the agents would not take notes signed in the name of the firm, and that he only wanted our names till he could have an opportunity to procure the name of Judge Ripley as an endorser to his notes. The great esteem I had for Judge Ripley, and a knowledge of his ability, induced me to give Mr. Phelps, as I was about to return to Connecticut, a written engagement to assume one-third of the risk, in case he should think it best to make the endorsement. Mr. Phelps made the endorsement for Stanley, and took into his hands, as security, Stanley's conveyance of seven hundred and fifty thousand acres of Georgia Mississippi Company's land, for which the endorsement was given; and, also, an assignment by Stanley of one hundred thousand acres more, which Seth Wetmore assigned to Stanley. Stanley failed. Judge Ripley denied the authority of Stanley to use his name in a land contract, and Mr. Phelps and myself, as endorsers, had to meet the $75,000. On the fourth day of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, we satisfied these obligations, and they were cancelled and delivered up. To acquire the means of satisfying these endorsements, we were compelled to dispose of 670,000 acres of this land, besides a vast deal of other property. When we called for the scrip on the two thousand acres, conveyed by Wetmore to Stanley, and by Stanley to Phelps, we found that Wetmore had conveyed the same land to Israel Munson, merchant in Boston. Here a new difficulty presented itself, which has been but lately removed. On the 30th of August, 1803, Mr. Phelps, to enable me to close this dispute, gave me a conveyance of these one hundred thousand acres; and on the 8th of September, in the same year, I effected a final settlement with Mr. Munson, of his claim for the joint benefit of Phelps and Granger. This explains the conveyances from Mr. Phelps and Mr. Munson to me, and these facts can be proved by these gentlemen, and by Judge Ripley, Amasa Jackson, Esq., of New York, Joseph Lyman, Esq., of Northampton, Massachusetts, Clerk of the Supreme Court, John Peck, &c.

On record, will also be found a conveyance of one hundred thousand acres, of December 8th, 1803, from John Peck to me. In this property I have not the least interest. It is deposited in my hands in lieu of special bail, in two cases, in favor of Eli Williams, of Hagerstown, against John Peck, of Boston, now pending before the court in this district. John Thompson Mason, Esq., knows this fact.

Finally, I have never been a dealer in this property, nor otherwise than is herein stated, interested therein; excepting only that in one instance I have received some scrip of a gentleman, whose fortune was consumed by his adventuring in the property, for a demand which was subsisting before the 13th of February, 1796.

Secondly. As to my accepting the agency. On the 17th day of February, 1803, the Commissioners on the part of the United States reported to Congress in favor of a compromise of these claims, and Congress afterwards, in the same session, made an appropriation of the 5,000,000 acres of land, to satisfy such demands as Congress might think best to provide for. Thus stood the business, without a single objection within my knowledge to a compromise, when, in August, 1803, its way within these walls, and that indirect advantages had been taken to influence the decision of the House upon a question pending before them. An officer of the Government, who considered his conduct much implicated, has informed that his public conduct has been arraigned, and prays an investigation into it. In my opinion, nothing can be more just and reasonable than to grant it. The Postmaster General has been accused by a member of this House of things which, if true, ought to occasion his removal from office. What was the conduct of the House at the last session? When a motion was made to inquire into the conduct of a judge, without any fact being stated, we were told that, if any member of the House entertained suspicion of his uprightness, we were bound to grant an inquiry. The same gentleman who, at the last session, demanded, as a matter of right, the appointment of a committee to inquire into the official conduct of Judge Chase, has, during this session, made charges of a very serious nature against the Postmaster General, and when that officer now requests an inquiry into his conduct, the friends of his accuser oppose the appointment of a committee of inquiry. I consider the House, on this occasion, bound to make the inquiry, both on account of the officer and the public, in order that, if the charges made against one of the directors of the New England Mississippi Company, solicited me to accept an agency in the business. Although I could not see any objection to it, as I was personally interested, and the duties of my office had not the least possible relation to the business, still I was not willing to accept the agency without advice. Accordingly I stated the case to the last Attorney General, who suggested that he would not be understood to give any opinion on the subject, but for his part he could not perceive the least objection to my acceptance. After this the agency was accepted, and I can with the greatest truth aver, that I then had not the least idea of any objection on the part of Congress. The only difficulty contemplated was that of bringing the claimants and the Commissioners to an agreement.

Lastly. As to my conduct as agent. I acknowledge that I have, in an open, fair, and plain manner, vindicated the rights of the company I represent. But I deny my attempting to make use of any kind of influence.

Here I appeal to the Commissioners, whether I have ever attempted to press anything in relation to the business. I make the same appeal to you, sir, and to every other member of the two Houses of Congress. If I have been guilty of what is charged upon me, there must be some one ready to rise up, and bear testimony against me. I trust I have virtue enough not to attempt improperly to influence any man. If not, I hold the members of Congress in too high respect to deem them capable of yielding to any improper influence.

For the truth of this statement, I appeal to the Author of my existence; and, in support of it, I pledge my character to you and to my country. I cannot close this letter without offering my ardent desire for an investigation of my conduct.

I am, sir, with high esteem and respect, your humble servant, him are true, he may be removed from office; if untrue, that it may be declared so. No possible harm can result from the inquiry, and it is due to an officer of Government whose character has been implicated. We have been told by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NELSON) that this was a matter of private feeling and honor between two gentlemen. Sir, I cannot agree with the gentleman, and it appears to me astonishing that he should consider it in the light he does. So far from considering it only as a matter of private feeling and honor, I consider the honor of our country is interested, and demands an inquiry, and that it can only be refused the officer who requests it by an act of despotism.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—I recollect but a single instance in which the conduct of an officer of the Government has been inquired into, at his request; that was the case of Mr. Wolcott, the late Secretary of the Treasury, who, upon his resignation, addressed a letter to the House, requesting an investigation into his conduct. That letter was couched in decent terms, and the language was such that no member could take umbrage at. Had the letter of the Postmaster General been written in the same style, I should have had no objection to the investigation, although I can see no good likely to result from it. But it is couched in such language as this House ought not to listen to. We are told in it, that charges made by a member of this House are untrue. Are we to sit here, and suffer such language to be used? I trust not, sir; had I known the language of the letter, I should have opposed its being read. If gentlemen wish an investigation into their conduct, they ought to ask it in decent terms; and I should not oppose it, although, as I before observed, I can see no good likely to result, for I trust that the Postmaster General will never be dignified with an impeachment. If the charges against him are true, the President ought to remove him, and it is to him that he ought to justify himself. If, however, gentlemen are anxious that an investigation should take place, let them lay a resolution to that effect on the table, and I will give it no opposition; but I will never agree that such a letter as the one now on the table be referred to a committee, and, by that means, give a sanction to the language contained in it.

Mr. GREGG regretted that such business had been brought before the House, especially at so late a period of the session. He did not know for what purpose an inquiry was to be made; for, supposing the charges to be true, the House had no power to remove him. The Postmaster General was not one of those officers who could be impeached; and the President was the only one that could remove him. He was opposed to the motion, conceiving that too much important business remains unfinished, to take up new matters, which would answer no good purpose whatever.

Mr. CLARK was opposed to the reference of the letter, on account of the language which it contained. It charged a member of the House with having uttered falsehood. In his opinion, such language ought not to receive any sanction from the House.

The Postmaster General had demanded an investigation into his conduct on account of some intemperate expressions used by a member of this House. Should the investigation take place, it would probably have a pernicious tendency, because the House would be troubled with similar applications whenever any member happened to speak disrespectfully of an officer of the Government. If the conduct of the officer had been improper, it might not be proper at that time to make the inquiry, as the session was drawing to a close, and they had much important business to transact. He was, therefore, decidedly opposed to the motion of reference, and trusted it would not be agreed to.

Mr. LYON.—I feel, Mr. Speaker, a sympathy for the Postmaster General, who, as well as myself, was so egregiously belied yesterday by the member from Virginia. (Mr. RANDOLPH.)

[Here Mr. NICHOLSON called Mr. LYON to order, whereupon the latter sat down, when the SPEAKER decided that the words were out of order.]

After this decision was made, Mr. LYON again rose to proceed, and was again called to order, but the SPEAKER determining that he was in order,

Mr. BRYAN appealed to the House, and

Mr. NICHOLSON called for the yeas and nays.

The question was then taken, "is the decision of the Chair correct?" And it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 81, nays 34, as follows:

Mr. LYON, upon this, immediately said, I give up my right; and would not proceed.

Mr. ELLIOT.—However surprising it may appear to some gentlemen, it is not so to me, that the language of innocence should be warm and pointed. We have been told that the letter is couched in disrespectful terms. For my part, I cannot perceive anything of the kind in it; and I am surprised that, as it respects the gentleman who made the charges against him, that he is so moderate. Gentlemen have said that an inquiry would be of no service; because, if the charges are true, the officer cannot be impeached. If gentlemen will advert to the Constitution they will find that "all civil officers are liable to impeachment," and removal from office. Surely it will not be contended that the Postmaster General is not a civil officer. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NICHOLSON) differs very widely from his friend from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) as to the Postmaster General. The former considers him as holding an office too insignificant to be dignified with an impeachment, while the latter deems his patronage and influence sufficient to influence or to bribe the majority of this House. However insignificant the gentleman from Maryland may think the Postmaster General, still he is a civil officer, and as such is liable to be impeached, and removed from office. We have been told that a combination has taken place between some of those who have avowed themselves republicans and the federalists, and that the liberties of the country will be endangered. Sir, we have no danger to apprehend from monarchists, aristocrats, or federalists.

Our liberty can only be endangered by those description of persons, against whom the gentleman from New York, (Mr. ROOT,) so emphatically exclaimed—I mean political demagogues and popular leaders! They have been the curse and destruction of every Republic, and I fear will be our destruction. We are cursed with them in this country, and even in this House. But I trust that the majority of this House are opposed to them. The great objection which gentlemen make to the inquiry is, that the letter is couched in too disrespectful terms. Will they please to bear in mind the charges made against the officer, and, viewing them, is it not a matter of astonishment that he is so mild? As the letter respects this House, it is remarkably respectful. Upon what ground, then, can the investigation be refused? If the charges made are true, the officer ought to be removed; if untrue, this House ought in justice to him whose character has been so assailed to declare that they are so. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) informed us yesterday that the Postmaster General kept in his pay a jackall, who went prowling about this desolate city, at midnight, when honest men ought to be asleep, offering bribes to the members. Sir, the gentleman must have keen optics to discover this jackall, when he is asleep; for he informs us that he only goes about when honest men ought to be asleep; and surely the gentleman is one of that description. Upon every view which I can take of this subject, I can see no objection to the inquiry, but the strongest reason in its favor; and justice demands that it should be made.

FEBRUARY, 1805.

Georgia Claims.

H. OF R.

Mr. NELSON would offer a few remarks to the House, why he was opposed to the motion. He would not undertake to give an opinion as to the character of the Postmaster General, or whether the charges made against him could be substantiated. His objection was, that the House had nothing to do with charges made by a member against any individual. If the charges were true, the President (and not the House) was the proper person to apply to, to remove the officer. But it had been said that the House had the power to impeach all civil officers, and, therefore, could impeach the Postmaster General. But, because the House was invested with that power, he asked whether they were bound to exercise it? Surely not. And he hoped they would not, when they could get rid of the officer by a more summary mode. Late experience had taught them the trouble and expense attendant on impeachments, and he trusted that no officer would ever be impeached that could be removed by the President. It would be better to let them remain in office, although guilty of misbehaviour, than to spend so much time as they would be obliged to do in cases of impeachment. Suppose the motion should be agreed to, and the committee appointed, he asked what power they would possess? Were they to declare whether the charges were true or false? A determination either way would have no effect upon the House, because they could not, he trusted, impeach the officer. He was not disposed to do anything to hurt the character of the Postmaster General, but he would not give his sanction to a measure which would spend so much of the time of the House in deciding what he considered an affair of private honor and private feelings between two gentlemen. He also considered that the adoption of the resolution would pass a censure upon the gentleman who made the charges, and he asked whether the House were disposed to censure one of its members for any warm and unguarded expressions about an officer of the Government? He trusted not. How many times had charges been made in the House against the President of the United States; but that officer had never thought it proper to apply to the House for an inquiry into his conduct; nor did the House ever pass a vote of censure on the members who made them. He looked upon this as a question of dispute between two gentlemen, and no tribunal could be erected in the House to decide on it. He should, therefore, vote against the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. VARNUM,) and hoped it would not prevail.

Mr. HUGER knew not what was the opinion of any gentleman as to the merits of the question, but he was satisfied that a calm decision of it could not take place at that time. They were about to establish a precedent, which might be of importance, and it ought to be done after the utmost deliberation. He called upon gentlemen to say, whether it was possible that a calm and impartial decision could be given after so much irritation had been displayed in the debate? In order to afford an opportunity to gentlemen to give the subject a cool and dispassionate investigation, he moved to postpone the further consideration thereof until Monday.

The question was taken thereon, and determined in the affirmative—yeas 93.

The resolution was never after called up.

GEORGIA CLAIMS.

The unfinished business of yesterday on the Yazoo claims was resumed—the amendment offered by Mr. CLARK, under consideration.

Mr. HOLMES observed that as he was a member of the Committee of Claims from whom the report under consideration emanated, he thought it his duty to state to the House the part he acted on that occasion. I was, said Mr. H., in all our deliberations upon this subject decidedly opposed to the adoption of the report, and in every stage of its progression used all fair means in my power to produce a different result; in this however I was unsuccessful. My conduct was governed by a firm conviction that the present claimants had no right in law or equity to the lands in question, and that policy did not demand the interference of the National Legislature. Most of the arguments that operated upon my mind then, and will influence my vote now, have been adduced by gentlemen who preceded me. It is not my intention to detain the House with a repetition of them; one or two however have occurred to me as worthy of consideration, that have not been urged. This must be my apology for addressing you after the able and lengthy discussion the subject has received. I am of the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that the Legislature of Georgia, of 1795, were not authorised to dispose of the lands in question, even if they had been honestly inclined to do so. This opinion is grounded upon the known maxims of Government and the Constitution under which that Legislature existed. The clause giving general powers to legislate for the good of the State, and by which it is contended the power was delegated, is in these words; "The General Assembly shall have power to make all laws and ordinances which they shall deem necessary and proper for the good of the State, which shall not be repugnant to this constitution." By an authority which will be respected by every member of this House and which I beg leave to read, it will be found that general powers to make laws for the good of the State does not extend to a right to part with public property. Vattel, in his Laws of Nations, lays down the following doctrine upon this subject: "The nation having the free disposal of all the property belonging to it; it may convey this right to the sovereign, and consequently confer upon him that of alienating and mortgaging the public property, but this right not necessarily belonging to the conductor of the State, to enable him to render the people happy by his 'government, it is not to be presumed that the nation has given it him, and if it has not made an express law for that purpose, it ought to be maintained that the Prince is not invested with it.' In no clause of the constitution alluded to, do we find an express authority to dispose of public property. If, therefore, the authority that I have just read is to have weight with the House in placing a construction upon that instrument, we must be ready to conclude that the people of Georgia did not delegate a power to the Legislature of 1795, to dispose of the lands in question. But, sir, this position is assailed by an argument drawn from the inconvenience of establishing it. We are told that if you adopt the principle that the Legislature of Georgia had no right to sell, you thereby call in question the titles to more than one-third of the cultivated soil in the nation, because no State Legislature in the Union, is, by express provision, authorized to make sale of their lands. I confess, Mr. Speaker, that, although this argument ab inconvenienti does not go to contravene the truth of the position I have laid down; yet if I could not by a further reference to the constitution in question, show its inapplicability in this instance, I should be ready to yield the ground I have taken, for it is not my wish, sir, that the lawful and equitable title to the land of a single individual in this community should be wantonly endangered. But, I confidently expect to be able to show that, by adopting this principle, for which I contend, we will not affect the validity of titles derived from States whose constitutions do not contain an express provision to sell. In the constitution of Georgia we find this sentence immediately following the clause I have read from it. "They shall have power to alter the boundaries of the present counties, and to lay off new ones, as well out of the counties already laid off, as out of the other territory belonging to the State." At the period of the adoption of the constitution, the people of Georgia owned an immense tract of unappropriated land. It cannot be doubted but the power granted to the Legislature to lay off new counties, had an allusion to this extensive back country, and it will not be denied but that a power to lay off a county is subordinate to that of selling a county. Can we then for a moment think that the convention who formed the constitution, supposed, by the clause granting general powers to legislate for the good of the State, they invested the Legislature with a right to sell the whole country to an individual, and that they did not by the same clause believe they had empowered them to lay off a new county within it? We cannot sir: the style and general correctness of the instrument warrants no such absurd conclusion. This clause, therefore, Mr. Speaker, is susceptible of no meaning whatever, or must be considered as limiting the power of the Legislature in relation to the lands in question. It may, however, be said, that it is declarative of a preparatory measure to that of disposing of the lands: giving it even this construction, it answers my purpose as well as the one for which I contend, and believe to be correct; because there was no law in force establishing a county within any of the lands in question at the time the contract for selling them was entered into. We need not, said Mr. H., be told that the Legislatures anterior to 1795, thought themselves invested with the right to sell vacant territory—their opinions should not be put in competition with that of the convention that formed the constitution of 1798. The people of a State, in their conventional capacity, are, unquestionably, better authority to resort to for an explanation of powers granted, than Legislatures, who are censurable if they transcend the limits of those powers. This convention did, sir, declare the law of 1795, disposing of the lands in question, to be an exercise of powers with which the Legislature was not invested, and by express provision they authorized after Legislatures to cede the same to the United States. It therefore appears clear to me, Mr. Speaker, that as the constitutions of the several States do not contain a special clause empowering the Legislature to lay off new counties, &c., we do not endanger the titles to lands sold under a general power to legislate for the good of the State, and we may safely and correctly vote for the amendment proposed by my colleague, and against the report of the Committee of Claims. Permit me, however, Mr. Speaker, to suppose, for the sake of argument, that I have been mistaken in this opinion; can the present claimants establish a title upon the ground of their being innocent purchasers? In the examination of this question I shall not recite the various circumstances which tend to show that they had notice of the fraud. This has already been done by gentlemen who preceded me, and I have no new deductions to make from the facts. Let us then suppose the possible case of their being wholly ignorant of the circumstances attending the original purchase; still I contend they cannot be entitled as innocent purchasers. In support of my opinion I lay down this maxim: that where a title is established in any one on the ground of his being an innocent purchaser, it must always be presupposed that the person claiming to be the rightful owner has, by his connivance, neglect, or misplaced confidence, been the cause of the deception. Apply it to the present case; are the people of Georgia chargeable with either fraud, neglect, or misplaced confidence? The first is out of the question, the last cannot be applied to them—for the delegation of a power to legislate for the good of the State was essentially necessary to the existence of the State; and it cannot be said the people were bound to be answerable to individuals who might suffer by the wilful and corrupt abuse of that power. But, sir, with respect to notice, the people of Georgia used all means in their power to apprise the whole world of the fraud that had been practised upon them, both pending the negotiation and after it was completed; their indignation at the transaction was no secret, they spoke aloud of the manner in which they had been betrayed. But there was no official notice! Alas, Mr. Speaker! the organ of the public sentiment (the Legislature) was polluted, the voice of the people could not approach them, their consciences were incarcerated with gold and impervious to the sound of truth. What could the people do but await the constitutional period of electing men that would speak their sentiments? They did so, and they stand acquitted of any neglect on their part. By the cession the United States are placed in the situation that the people of Georgia would have stood in if it had not been made. If therefore the present claimants had no legal or equitable demand upon them previous thereto, they have none upon us now. One word, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the expediency of adopting the resolution proposed by the committee. It never can be expedient to do an act of manifest injustice. If the petitioners are entitled to any part, they are entitled to the whole of the lands in question. Can it be just in us, because we have the power, to compel them to receive one-eighth part? If, on the other hand, they have no title whatever in law or equity, which I religiously believe, do we not do an act of great injustice to the public by giving them near five millions of acres? We unquestionably do. Some allusions have been made in the course of debate to the conduct of the Committee of Claims. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot defend it upon this occasion. I have been for some years past one of the victims devoted to take a part in the arduous, unpleasant, and unthankful duties assigned to that committee—to bear my share not only of the labor, but the importunities and reproaches of the disappointed applicants. No considerations heretofore have induced us to relax from that regular administration of justice, conformable to law and precedent, in which we have uniformly met with the approbation of the House. But, long as I have been a member, Mr. Speaker, I cannot turn to a single instance wherein the committee have recommended a compromise of a claim; we give but seldom, but when we do give, we honestly give all that is due.

Mr. LYON.—After having taken a view of the subject now before the House, during the last session, in all its shapes and bearings, and after having, in a very ample and explicit manner, given the reasons which governed my vote at that time, it was my intention to have given a silent vote on this occasion. The hope of changing the mind of a single member does not now call upon me to rise; no, sir, the uncandid insinuations, the undeserved reproaches and criminations from a member from Virginia have caused me to break through that silence I had imposed upon myself. Yet, since I am up, permit me to remind you, sir, of that view, and in a very brief manner of those reasons which will in every stage of this business induce me to adhere to the contemplated compromise. It seems that the government of Georgia, in 1792, made an agreement with certain companies which was not fulfilled by the grantees, nor consummated by the government of Georgia, for the sale of a large part of their western lands; accordingly, the Legislature again offered those lands for sale, and by solemn legislative and executive acts, did sell, and by deed convey forty millions of acres of those lands to certain other companies, for which they received the compensation agreed on. That those grantees, having it in their power to show to purchasers the best possible evidence of a good and authentic title, did sell the property thus purchased to other purchasers, who had the best right imaginable to put faith in the authenticated documents and title papers presented to them—documents and title papers as good as any ever obtained from an individual by another, or from a State or a nation by a purchaser. Notwithstanding which the succeeding Legislature, not liking the bargain, assumed or attempted to assume the power of reclaiming the property; and passed an act purporting their intention of invalidating the title given by their predecessors, as well as for the destruction of the records and every evidence of the title given by them.

It appears that the purchasers, when they found Georgia offering to cede those lands to the United States, gave warning and notice of their claims to the Chief Magistrate of the Union; in consequence of which, or for some other cause, a provision for a compromise with the claimants was made in the law which authorized the holding a treaty with Georgia respecting the cession of those lands. Commissioners of the United States, agreeably to the powers vested in them by that provision, have met the claimants, and have, it seems, agreed on terms of compromise, which in my opinion are very advantageous to the United States; which compromise is now before this House for their sanction.

I stated last year that, under my impression of the validity of the title of the claimants, the compromise was more advantageous to the nation than could be expected; more advantageous to be sure than I had previously expected could have been made. I still think it an advantageous bargain, on account of the revenue which will arise from the sale of the residue of the lands—seven-eighths of forty millions, to which an unexceptionable title can then be given, a title which good farmers and useful settlers will not fear to improve under. Advantageous, I say also, on account of the benefit to be derived from the early settlement of some of the best lands, and in the best situation of any the Government claims—a country intersected by many navigable waters, and through which the road goes from almost every State in the Union to Natchez and New Orleans; a road which, in the present state of things, is frequently infested with murderers and freebooters.

Nothing could be more surprising to me than the opposition this, in my opinion, reasonable, necessary and profitable compromise has met with, both last session and this. I say profitable, because it takes not a cent out of the Treasury, nor from any other fund but the land itself; which, however wrong it was to purchase it, knowing it to be sold to others, whose claim was in a measure recognised by the contemplated compromise at the very outset of the negotiation—however wrong, I say, it might have been for the United States to have become the purchasers, they have not paid, nor are they bound to pay a shilling from any other fund than the land itself, notwithstanding all this clamor about robbery. Such has ever been my opinion of public faith, that although I doubt not that bribery was used in the Legislature of Georgia in the transaction of 1795, to a certain degree, their successors and the State were bound to abide by the solemn contract. I say solemn, because it appears to be confirmed by the Executive of the State, against whom I do not recollect any charge of bribery to have been made. Had that Executive (who was on the spot, and must have been a better judge of the corruption talked of than we can be) arrested, by his withholding hand, the completion of the contract, and refused his signature to those papers which enabled the purchasers to convey their purchase to others, I should now say, the title being incomplete, we have nothing to fear from it, we want no compromise. This no doubt would have been done had the Executive supposed that the people of Georgia were injured, and that they would support him in that refusal. But, sir, the honors and preferments retained by and conferred on so many of those persons charged with the bribery, leads me to believe that there were causes unknown to me which led to the uneasiness on the part of the people of Georgia, with regard to the sale in 1795, and led to the attempt at resuming the right to the lands in 1796.

In the course of this discussion, we who wish for a compromise of this perplexing business—this business which seems to be kindling the greatest discord in the nation—have been charged with an intention of committing a robbery which is far to exceed all the petty larcenies of the former Administration, and such of us as have aided to depose the former and support the present Administration, are threatened with being for the future considered as Federalists, let our professions be what they may. For my part, I can assure the member who threatens us, that it never in my life gave me pain to be called a Federalist, in the true sense of that word—in the sense in which the word was used by the great man who said, "We are all Federalists, we are all Republicans;" but, sir, it really gives me pain to hear and to see the character of the head of one of the Departments of our Government lugged into this debate, and so illiberally treated. The man I respect highly both for his integrity and talents—in the first of which, in my opinion, he stands behind no man in this nation; and although he has the misfortune to suffer the censure of the member from Virginia, I believe he enjoys almost universal applause for the great zeal, fidelity, and sound discretion with which he has discharged the important functions entrusted to him.

From the drift of the speeches delivered by the member from Virginia, from his call for the Postmaster General's report of a list of his contracts, and from the invitation he has given to an examination of that report, I am led to consider it a duty I owe to myself, in this House, and in the face of the world, to take up that report, and explain the nature of the contracts which there appear in my name. I find my name seven times mentioned in that report: the first is in the 12th page, for a contract for carrying the mail from Cincinnati to Detroit; the second in the same page, and is from Marietta to Cincinnati; these two contracts I never solicited or bid for, but the Postmaster General having advertised for proposals, and having received none that he thought reasonable, they being new routes and to be let for one year only, he wrote to me offering the price they stand there at, and I undertook to get the business done. For the performance of the latter contract I gave every cent I received, and without saving one penny for a great deal of trouble, risk, and perplexity, I had taken upon myself to get it effected. From the other I saved a few dollars toward paying me for the care, trouble, and responsibility I had sustained on the occasion. Long before these contracts were out, I informed the Postmaster General that I should take neither of them again, and the contract from Cincinnati to Detroit was let to another person at $105 60 more than was given to me; this may be seen in the 22d line of page 20 of the same report.

The third time my name is mentioned is in the same 12th page, and is from Hartford to Fort Massac, a distance of about 180 or 190 miles, for which $654 75 is paid; out of this $65 is to be paid for ferriage. For some parts of this route I am obliged to give much more than a proportionate share of what I receive; some other parts I give a trifle less; sometimes my own horses carry the mail. I cannot with precision tell what is lost or gained in it, but it cannot be $50 either way. The fourth contract is also in the same page, it is from Russelsville to Eddygrove, or, rather, Eddyville; it is 80 miles, for which $240 is paid; this is as low if not lower than the price given anywhere south or west of this place, and I give to the person who performs it the whole amount of what I receive. The fifth and sixth time my name is mentioned in that report is in the 28th page—those are merely a renewal of the two last mentioned contracts, which had expired in 1803; all of those contracts were made before I was elected to my present seat in this House, before I had the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with the present Postmaster General, and before I ever spoke with him.

The seventh contract is noticed in the last page of the Postmaster General's report, which is from Massac to New Madrid, from Kaskaskias to Girardeau, from Cahoka to St. Louis, a distance of more than 200 miles, for $515, out of which more than $150 must be paid for ferriage, at the rate ferriages stood at the time of the contract.

This is the true history of the contracts by which it is insinuated that the Postmaster General has bribed me. I never was bribed, sir; it is not all the lands and negroes my accuser owns that could tempt me to do a thing which honor or conscience dictated to me to avoid. I could, sir, if it was pertinent, show how the over-vigilance of the present Postmaster General has deprived me of the benefit of the only profitable contract I ever made with the Government—a contract made with his predecessor—which he very improperly, in my opinion, considered void on account of some words in it not being exactly consonant with the intention of the contracting parties; believing, however, that the Postmaster

General designed to do what he thought right, he has not lost my esteem. nor do I think his character can be injured by the braying of a jackall or the fulminations of a madman. But, sir, permit me to inquire from whom these charges of bribery, of corruption, and of robbery, come. Is it from one who has for forty years, in one shape or other, been intrusted with the property and concerns of other people, and has never wanted for confidence—one whose long and steady practice of industry, integrity, and well doing, has obtained him his standing on this floor? Is it from one who sneered with contempt on the importunity with which he was solicited to set a price on the important vote he held in the last Presidential election? No, sir; these charges have been fabricated in the disordered imagination of a young man whose pride has been provoked by my refusing to sing encore to all his political dogmas. I have had the impudence to differ from him in some few points, and some few times to neglect his fiat. It is long since I have observed that the very sight of my plebeian face has had an unpleasant effect on the gentleman's nose—for out of respect to this House and to the State he represents, I will yet occasionally call him gentleman. I say, sir, these charges have been brought against me by a person nursed in the bosom of opulence, inheriting the life services of a numerous train of the human species, and extensive fields, the original proprietors of which property, in all probability, came no honester by it than the purchasers of the Georgia lands did what they claim. Let that gentleman apply the fable of the thief and the receiver, in Dilworth's Spelling Book, so ingeniously quoted by himself, in his own case, and give up the stolen men in his possession.

I say, sir, these charges have come from a person whose fortune, leisure, and genius, have enabled him to obtain a great share of the wisdom of the schools, but who in years, experience, and the knowledge of the world and the ways of man, is many, many years behind those he implicates—a person who, from his rant in this House, seems to have got his head as full of British contracts and British modes of corruption as ever Don Quixotte's was supposed to have been of chivalry, enchantments, and knight errantry—a person who seems to think no man can be honest and independent unless he has inherited lands and negroes, nor is he willing to allow a man to vote in the people's elections, unless he is a landholder.

I can tell that gentleman, I am as far from offering or receiving a bribe as he or any other member on this floor; it is a charge that no man ever made against me before him, who from his insulated situation, unacquainted with the world, is perhaps as little acquainted with my character as any member of this House, or almost any man in the nation; and I do most cordially believe that, had my back and my mind been supple enough to rise and fall with his motions, I should have escaped his censure.

I, sir, have none of that pride which sets men above being merchants and dealers; the calling of a merchant is, in my opinion, equally dignified, and no more than equally dignified with that of a farmer or a manufacturer. I have a great part of my life been engaged in all the stations of merchant, farmer, and manufacturer, in which I have honestly earned and lost a great deal of property, in the character of a merchant. I act like other merchants, look out for customers with whom I can make bargains advantageous to both parties; it is all the same to me, whether I contract with an individual or the public; I see no Constitutional impediment to a member of this House serving the public for the same reward the public gives another. Whenever my constituents or myself think I have contracts inconsistent with my duties as a member of this House, I will retire from it.

I came to this House as a representative of a free, a brave, and a generous people. I thank my Creator that he gave me the face of a man, not that of an ape or a monkey, and that he gave me the heart of a man also, a heart which will spare to its last drop in defence of the dignity of the station my generous constituents have placed me in. I shall trouble the House no farther at this time, than by observing that I shall not be deterred by the threats of the member from Virginia, from giving the vote I think the interest and honor of the nation requires; and by saying if that member means to be understood that I have offered contracts from the Postmaster General, the assertion or insinuation has no foundation in truth, and I challenge him to bring forward his boasted proof.

Mr. J. CLAY.—It was not my intention to have troubled the House with any observations on the subject, but I think a view may be taken different from any exhibited by the gentlemen who have preceded me. Some of the gentlemen who have advocated the appropriation of the land to satisfy the New England Mississippi Land Company, have been content to rest the claim upon the ground of policy. They have said that if some mode should not be taken to satisfy the Yazoo speculators, they would be incessantly troubling Congress. If these men have any title, it must be by right of pre-emption; and yet that title it was not practicable for them to acquire, as the State of Georgia could not extinguish the Indian title. Notwithstanding, however, their imbecility, the Legislature of Georgia, of 1796, undertook to grant an estate in fee simple. It will require more time to examine this question, and perhaps more abilities than I possess; but I cannot conceive how Georgia had a pre-emption title to the land, while the Indian title still existed. The Congress of the United States possessed the sole power of extinguishing the Indian title to lands within her territories: no individual State has either the right or the power of extinguishing the Indian title to any lands they may claim. Of course, Georgia had no right to grant a title in fee simple.

We are told of the policy of compromising with these speculators, and that they are innocent purchasers. How are they so? Are they not the very men who purchased a fraudulent claim, and does not their deed carry on the face of it a proof that they knew it to be fraudulent? There is also a strange coincidence: These people's deeds are dated February 13th, 1796, the very day that the rescinding act was passed, but these instruments were not all executed until May following. [Here Mr. J. CLAY read several passages from the pamphlet published by the agents of the New England Yazoo Company, and compared them with the resolution of Congress passed on that subject, from which he inferred an acknowledgment of the present claimants, that they purchased a disputed title.] He went on to state that Governor Strong, who was at that time a Senator of the United States, was made acquainted with the whole transaction; and it could not but be presumed that he and the Massachusetts delegation communicated to their constituents the circumstance.

H. OF R.

Georgia Claims.

FEBRUARY, 1805.

The general notoriety of the fraud, said Mr. CLAY, is such as to convince any man that the present claimants are not innocent purchasers. The very conditions under which they purchased, demonstrate this. They undertake to stand in the shoes of men who had defrauded the State of Georgia through a corrupt Legislature, and when they paid their money, they conditioned that it should not be repaid them, by reason of any defect in the title. The petitioners take it for granted, that, whatever was the fate of the original compact, though bottomed in fraud and consequently null, they have no other resource than in the mercy of this House. Why did they make that stipulation in their deed? Why not take a general warrantee? If the deeds had been executed in the usual manner, they could have recovered their money from the party who had practised upon them. But notwithstanding that article, I still think they should have recourse to the original grantees; let them go to them, and a court of equity will do them justice.

I have no idea of supporting questions of property upon grounds of mere policy; I shall never be inclined to squander millions of the public money, because a gang of swindling speculators may enter this House and prove troublesome to its members. The agents of these men have accidentally acknowledged that they cannot extinguish the Indian title, and, therefore, they cannot get possession of the land. What is a man to get by a contract, when it is impossible to comply with the terms? I was in hopes, that the representation from the State of Pennsylvania would have been unanimous on this question: they ought to know, from the salutary experience of their own State respecting land speculations, whether it relates to the Connecticut, Susquehanna, or Delaware companies, who have kept a part of our State in a continual broil for fifty years, while another set of men, under the garb of the Population and Holland companies, have thrown their warrants over the northwestern corner of the State, and are likely to defeat the great objects which the Legislature had in view, when they disposed of the lands to actual settlers alone. I trust, however, that they will be defeated, and that the courts of justice will determine the case in the manner in which it was recently decided. I regret that the oldest member of Congress from our State, should, at this late hour, abandon those republican principles, which he has so long and so ably maintained, to support a band of Yazoo speculators. For my part, I must be an altered man indeed, if I ever consent to a compromise with a gang of speculators holding a title founded in fraud and speculation.

Mr. BEDINGER said that as the gentleman from Virginia, who first spoke in opposition to the report, had called on the Committee of Claims for the reasons on which the report was grounded, and particularly for their reasons for departing on this occasion from the course usually pursued of assigning the reasons on which a report was made, he would, as he was a member of the committee, take the liberty of making a short explanation of facts, which might, in some measure, afford the satisfaction requested. The Committee of Claims was composed of seven members; of these, three were opposed to the report. They contended in committee that the reasons for the report ought to be stated; that before they called on the House to sanction the extraordinary resolutions recommended, cogent argument should be adduced. But this course of procedure was overruled by the majority, for the best reason on earth, because there was no good ground, no sound principle, on which these resolutions could be supported.

When the subject was first submitted to the committee, the minority, of which I was one, entertained hopes that the principles, which had heretofore governed the Committee of Claims, principles long established and sanctioned by the House, would not be dispensed with on this occasion. These were, where a claim was just and equitable, to grant a full compensation; and if otherwise to reject it altogether. Heretofore they had never conceived it equitable or honorable, when there was a just and legal claim, to propose a compromise. And it surely would be highly dishonorable to give to any man, possessed of a good claim, only a part of his just right. We thought it would be degrading to the dignity of this House and of the committee to adopt such a practice. The question was, therefore, put—Had the original grantees any good title, either in law or equity? It was not pretended that they had. We hoped that this point would be decided by the committee, and the decision reported to the House. But we were baffled in this expectation. The majority refused to pursue this course.

Driven from this ground, we thought proper to rely on the abundant evidences of corruption and fraud reported by the Commissioners, and contended, using their own words, that the claim could not be supported. But here again we were overruled.

We then called upon the Representatives of the State of Georgia for such information as they possessed, deeming such information important towards enabling us to make a satisfactory report, and the House a just decision. But unfortunately our inquiries were to little purpose, as the ma-majority overruled the course we wished to pursue. The Representatives informed us of many circumstances contradictory to the statements of the petitioners, of which I will state a few. They represented, that when one of the agents mentioned that he claimed for or under a certain James Bulgin, he was told that James Bulgin was at Augusta during the whole session of 1795, but that he was not an original purchaser; which led me to believe that he was fully acquainted with the fraud, and had no just pretensions to compensation. One of the agents, Mr. Pippin, stated in the presence of the committee that he held under Bulgin.

They represented that the statement of money said to have been expended and used for the benefit of the State, was not true; and this was fully explained, I think, to the conviction of every member of the committee.

They represented that the great body of the people of Georgia were opposed to the sale of the lands, and that only a small part, called the combined party, were in favor of selling. That there was at the time of the sale no extraordinary call for money. That the indignation of the whole people of Georgia had overwhelmed the authors of this black transaction. That presentments had within three months been made by grand juries in seven out of nine of the counties of the State. That the road from Augusta to Charleston was used by travellers almost as frequently as the road leading from the Capitol to Georgetown, and that consequently everything of importance which was transacted at Augusta must have soon reached Charleston; travelling from which place to Boston was usual at all seasons of the year.

This, and much more important information, was given by the Representatives from Georgia, men who, from the honor and respectability of their characters are more to be depended upon than any commissioner who may be sent to that State, who most probably would be guided by ex parte evidence.

I consider this question as very important. Let it be recollected that the land in dispute is as large in extent as six States of the Union. What, then, would have been the situation of the United States had these avaricious men succeeded in their gigantic designs?

During the course of this discussion, the merits of the Committee of Claims have been often alluded to. To elucidate the conduct of the committee, I have made this explanation. If any credit is due to those who compose the majority they are welcome to all the honor which can flow from their report. I claim no part of it. I deem myself a representative of the people, appointed to guard their interests from violation. I cannot, therefore, render to my constituents any satisfactory reasons for putting the property, thus confided to me, into the hands of individuals not answerable to them for their conduct. I believe it safer that this power should remain in the hands of Congress, than that it should be placed in the hands of the best men that can be appointed.

Mr. DANA said that he had not intended to have risen on the present question, but the respect he owed to the Committee of Claims, which had been attacked by the two gentlemen last up, who were also members of that committee, obliged him to take some notice of what had been said. He had the honor of being chairman of that committee; but it was well known to this House that it was not a place of his seeking; and he believed there was no one member of that committee who aspired to the honor of the toil and drudgery their chairman was compelled to undergo. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. BEDINGER) well knows, said Mr. D., that I thought the office ought not to be pressed upon me. He knows the motives on which it was bestowed, and he will have the goodness to recollect that after every other attempt to disentangle myself, I threw out to them an idea that perhaps they would repent having placed me in it. Having, however, once undertaken the task, I performed its duties according to the best of my abilities, and with the greatest assiduity. I did not, however, conceive that when I devoted myself to this service I was to be the servile instrument of any man or set of men, or to be a slave to their opinions. I always gave to the subjects referred to us the best examination and consideration in my power.

Whenever the House decided a question of reference to that committee, whatever might be my own private opinion on the principle, I always considered it my duty to conform the report to the declared will of the House; until that was manifested I always considered myself to act as I judged proper.

It is objected by the two gentlemen who preceded me, that on the present subject the committee pursued a course that had no precedent; if such be the fact, I am uninformed, for be it known that the present chairman of the Committee of Claims had never until this session been a member of that committee: Nor, as a member of Congress, did he know that a proposition of compromise had ever been before referred to the Committee of Claims. So far as his recollection served him, all claims heretofore submitted were for the whole or nothing, and after the applicants had been fully heard before the committee, the question turned upon those two pivots—all or none. On the subject now under consideration, the question was solely as to compromise, and that alone was agitated when the committee took it into consideration; and it will be recollected that the committee adjourned without coming to a decision. The rules of the House which govern in Committees of the Whole, are also applied to the Committee of Claims, and when the House has settled a principle, and referred to the Committee of Claims to make the application, the committee never attempt to travel out of the path prescribed.

I here take the liberty of asking what was the question referred to the Committee of Claims. Certainly it was a proposition for a compromise, or nothing; every member of the committee must know this. I believe there is not a single member on this floor who is a stranger to the fact. What, then, sir, was the committee to think of the order of the House? Is it understood that the committee were never to report because compromise was the object? Was it intended to make the committee the mere instruments of delay? Yet it must be so understood if they were not to act. That the subject referred was such as I have stated is very clear, and the fact is so stated in the report before the House. And to show that it was so considered and acted upon by the committee, I will read an extract from the report itself, which, after giving an historical account of the transactions relating to the sale of the vacant lands of Georgia proceeds:

"These conflicting acts present a general question of serious moment, on which the committee abstain from expressing a decided opinion. It is not the object of the present applications, that Congress should decide the question of strict title, as originally claimed under the beforementioned act of the 7th of January, 1795.

"The petitioners request a settlement of their claims, on terms compatible with the articles of agreement before mentioned. At the same time it is proposed, as an alternative, that the whole question of title may be submitted finally to judicial decision. The general provisions of the existing laws of the United States do not authorize the institution of any process on the part of the claimants, whereby such a proposition could be carried into effect. And perhaps it might be questioned, whether a special provision for this purpose would be conformable to the spirit of the agreement with Georgia. It is not suggested that any proceedings of the Government of the United States have encouraged an expectation that such provision would be made.

"The remaining inquiry relates to a settlement of claims by compromise. This is the known object of the present applications; and the Committee of Claims have considered it incumbent on them to attend to the proposition for compromise which has thus been referred to them by the House.

"According to the agreement with Georgia, the reserved five millions of acres constitute the whole fund applicable to any such purpose. What portion of this fund will be requisite for satisfying the claims specially provided for by the two first sections of the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1803, the committee have not been able to determine. From the residue, however, whatever the same may be, it is prayed that a compensation may be made on account of the claims of the present applicants.

"Some of these claims are known to relate to lands within a portion of territory to which there has been a claim on the part of the United States and of Georgia. The act of Congress, of the 7th of April, 1798, which authorized the establishment of a government in the Mississippi Territory as therein described, made provision for the appointment of Commissioners to adjust and determine with such Commissioners as might be appointed under the legislative authority of the State of Georgia, all interfering claims of the United States and that State to the territory; and also to receive proposals for the relinquishment of any such cession of the whole or any part of the other territory claimed by the State of Georgia and out of its ordinary jurisdiction. A supplementary act, of the 10th of May, 1800, authorized the Commissioners, on the part of the United States, finally to settle, by compromise with the Commissioners on the part of Georgia, any claims mentioned in the act of the 7th of April, 1798; and to receive, in behalf of the United States, a cession of any land therein mentioned, or of the jurisdiction thereof, on such terms as should appear reasonable. The same act also authorized the Commissioners, on the part of the United States, to inquire into the claims made by settlers, or any other persons, to any part of the aforesaid lands, and to receive from such settlers and claimants any propositions of compromise, and lay a full statement of the claims and propositions, together with their opinion, before Congress, for their decision thereon.

"In virtue of these acts, the Commissioners of the United States concluded the beforementioned agreement with Georgia, and thereby settled the interfering public claims."

This shows that, according to their understanding, the thing referred was a compromise, and not a question of strict title. Nor do the Committee of Claims, so far as I have information, ever offer a compromise of a claim that goes for the whole amount. Let gentlemen read over the memorial and they will find that I am correct. Not a member now sitting in his place, but who will accord with the opinion expressed by the committee. Were the committee to report on a question not referred to them. Were we so ignorant of our duty, and so perverse that we could not understand, or would not perform the duties required by the House? And were we to subscribe a declaration of an opinion on a subject not before the committee? Whatever may be the admissibility or inadmissibility of the claim of the present applicants, or my opinion thereon, is not the point I am endeavoring to elucidate; or what is, or was, the sense of the House on referring it to the Committee of Claims. From whatever cause the reference sprung, the thing once consented to ought to be attended to, and it was the duty of the committee to do what they were enjoined to perform.

I do not know that there was any deviation from the usual course of proceeding in the committee on this subject whilst it was pending before them. As respects the mode of conducting the inquiry, I can assert that everything was done as orderly and as carefully as on any other claim ever before them. In the first stage of the business, efforts were made to obtain information from every quarter where it was likely to be procured, whereby the propriety of the claims could be tested, that the whole subject, with all its circumstances, might be drawn to a focus, and presented fully and fairly in one view. A general desire was expressed that any gentleman who could throw any light on it, would be pleased to attend the committee, and communicate such information as he possessed. In consequence of this invitation, two of the Delegates from Georgia were present; one of them a member of this House, the other a member of the Senate. And the inquiry was prosecuted with a degree of minuteness seldom equalled, but never exceeded, in a committee of this body, so far as I have witnessed, since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor.

H. OF R.

One of the first points of inquiry, was to ascertain whether the present claimants had notice of fraud; and whether we could bring home to them the proof of direct knowledge, or short of that, whether they had an indirect knowledge of the fraud. One of the gentlemen, the gentleman from Georgia, who I see now in his place, answered with that candor and frankness, that removed all doubt of the correctness of his information, even if his general character had not been a security for the fidelity of his relations. I consider this circumstance as highly honorable to him, because it was known that he was hostile to the claim; but, sir, so much did that gentleman hold his passion in subjection to his sense of propriety, that his information had, and deservedly had, the most decisive influence upon the members of the committee.

When he was asked, whether the New England Mississippi Land Company had notice of the alleged fraud? He answered, he did not know that they had. He was asked whether the presentments of the grand juries were published in any newspapers that went to the State of Massachusetts? He could not say that they were; it was not probable that the information was sent there. He was asked if he knew whether an account of those transactions in Georgia, was published in any paper that had a general circulation in the other States? He did not know that they were. Thus far the inquiry went, as to notice to the New England Mississippi Land Company. With respect to the South Carolina Yazoo Company, for whom tracts had been reserved, the inquiries touching that point were the same.

He was asked whether the grand juries made the presentments in such time as that it was probable they could reach South Carolina previous to the contracts being entered into for purchasing the Upper Mississippi Companies' title to their lands? He answered, he could not tell; but added, that the grand juries made their presentments generally at the first courts which sat after the passing of the act of January, 1795, and the first court sat either the third or fourth Tuesday (which of these days, Mr. D. said, he did not perfectly recollect) in February following; and the deed of conveyance is dated the 6th of March. He was asked, what was the distance from the counties in which presentments were made to South Carolina, and whether they might not obtain information through the usual channel of the newspapers; and whether he knew that any of the purchasers had seen an account of those transactions? He answered, that there was nothing to make it probable that the purchasers in South Carolina had notice. There was no variation in the statement made by the two gentlemen.

It was inquired, whether bribery and corruption were punishable by the laws of Georgia? It was answered that nothing existed in the laws of Georgia on that subject. It was asked, had any person been prosecuted and punished in the counties where the presentments were made? He answered that no indictments had been found upon the presentments—not a single one. In this statement, I have confined myself to simple facts, and I appeal to the gentleman to say whether I am not correct.

During this inquiry, I felt astonished that crimes of such enormity as those alleged to have been perpetrated in Georgia should be suffered to pass with impunity, and that not a single prosecution for fraud, bribery, or corruption, had taken place, but that the whole was passed over without making a single example, although presented by grand juries in almost every county of the State, and the universal indignation of the people was excited. What was the inference to be drawn from this statement of facts? Either that the proof of the crime was not sufficiently clear and connected to establish the fact upon a legal inquiry, or that they did not wish to prosecute. The only effect produced was the rescinding act by the next Legislature. To inquire whether that Legislature might not likewise be suspected of bribery and corruption, was a question of too horrible an aspect to enter into the breast of any citizen in this country; the case is unprecedented in the United States. Whether such an inquiry will ever be proper to make or not, I know not; but it was not an inquiry for the Committee of Claims to make, because it was not necessary for them to inquire into the question of strict title. The question was not to give the present claimants all they claim or to give them nothing; the question was not a disdain to compromise with fraud. That might be the result of a judicial investigation of the case, but was by no means the question before the committee. I will here ask whether it is a mark of fraudulent title, or incompetency to support a legal one, when there are interfering or conflicting claims, and a compromise is suggested between the parties, when an inquiry into a legal or equitable title would suspend a settlement until the parties were mutually ruined? Can it be considered as a mark of corruption, that in such a case, a part should be given instead of the whole, and the dispute thereby settled to mutual advantage? Is it a proof of corruption in the party which accepts a fraction instead of a unit, rather than go through a judicial investigation? Is it a proof of no title? But this point is decided by the act of Congress in the settlement with Georgia; the United States took the lands, allowing a portion of the claim of the United States to be applied to quiet the claims made upon Georgia to the amount of five million of acres. So that it cannot be considered a mark of corruption, unless the badge is also attached to the Government of the Union; and I am confident no such idea can be entertained of Congress by the people of this or any other country on earth.

Would gentlemen, in their private concerns, refuse to act upon this principle? Would they not prefer an accommodation to a law-suit, when an adverse claimant exhibited a feasible title, not to say one strictly legal? If gentlemen demur to this mode of settlement, they forget the general practice of this country, and the maxims of private life, that peace and quiet with a part is better than strife and litigation with the whole.

FEBRUARY, 1805.

And such, it appears, was the opinion of the Congress which authorized the Commissioners on the part of the United States to adjust and determine all interfering claims of the United States and of Georgia in the Mississippi Territory, and the Congress of 1800, which authorized the Commissioners on the part of the United States finally to settle by compromise with the Commissioners of Georgia, and to receive a cession of the lands on reasonable terms. The same act expressly authorizes the Commissioners to inquire into the claim of settlers, and to receive from such settlers or claimants any propositions of compromise, the whole to be laid before Congress for their decision.

I apprehend this rapid view of the point in question has thrown the objection to compromise entirely out of sight, or if its recollections are still cherished, I refer them to what was said by the gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. BOYD,) showing the necessity of getting rid of the claim in the manner proposed; what he said was well urged, and I have not the vanity to think it could be illustrated or embellished by any observations of mine.

The amendment before the House to the resolution goes to direct that the whole five million of acres reserved may be applied to pay the South Carolina and Virginia Yazoo Company claims under the act of 1789, as it excludes every claim made under the act or pretended act of 1795. Let me ask, Mr. Speaker, if this amendment does not defeat the object of the resolution altogether, which is visibly to adjust and settle finally the claim of the present applicants as well as all other claims to public lands in that Territory, and is not consequently inadmissible? But, sir, you have decided it to be in order, and, therefore, I shall not dwell on that point. But are gentlemen ready; are they prepared to go the whole length to which the amendment would carry them; and will they really give to the Virginia and South Carolina Yazoo Companies the five million of acres, when they claim but a very small proportion of that amount? Permit me to call upon the mover (Mr. CLARK) for an explanation of his intention.

Mr. CLARK explained, and stated that the object of his motion was to meet and repel that class of claims which had excited such an interest on this floor, and whose cause had been advocated with such energy—and if it was fortunate enough to obtain a majority in its favor, he was frank enough to declare that he would vote against the whole resolution as amended.

Mr. DANA thanked the gentleman for his frankness, from which he learned that the gentleman meant to defeat the claim of 1789, as well as that of 1795. This being the object, he need not make another observation on the propriety of devoting the whole to the South Carolina and Virginia Yazoo Companies.

Various observations, said Mr. DANA, have been pressed into service, which seem to have no very particular relation to the subject. I will acknowledge that some of those observations deserve some attention on my part, from a regard to the general character and standing of the gentleman who has made them, rather than from their relevancy to the subject, or their intrinsic force. The first general idea thrown out is this: That the proposition of the committee must be wrong, because men of different political sentiments appear in its defence. Let us examine this position, not as a model for argument, but rather as an effort of eloquence; for the gentleman is eloquent, and trusts to eloquence to carry him through all his difficulties. He disdains the arbitrary trammels of logic; and the dull and beaten paths of plain reasoning have nothing to gratify his taste or imagination. For my part, when I see gentlemen avoid the course of plain argument, I am inclined to believe they are aware of the weakness of their cause. And when they who understand a subject, instead of entering into a discussion of its merits, apply their talents in making a pathetic and eloquent appeal to the people from their representatives on this floor, what are we to think of their conduct? If the gentleman had argument on his side, would he have recourse to such means then? No, sir, the gentleman from Virginia does not rely upon the strength of his positions; but he endeavors to storm your judgment through the violence of your passions. The report applies itself to the understanding of honest men, and men of plain and common sense; the inquiry it makes has for its object a compliance with the order of the House, and not a digression toward objects totally distinct and unconnected.

I beg to be indulged in a brief examination of the question whether the agreement of the members of this House, supposed to consist of different political parties, is a proof that they are influenced by bribery or corruption. It is laid down as a broad position, and must equally apply to every vote given in this House, wherein members of both sides have coincided. Last session the national character was struck at by the lawless acts of the pirates of the Mediterranean. The President called for the means of avenging the insulted honor of the nation. The yeas and nays were called on furnishing these means, and the vote turned out to be unanimous. Was this a proof of bribery or corruption on either side? We have had a similar vote this session on giving the people of Louisiana the right of self-government, and the resolution to this effect passed unanimously. But if it is considered as a mark of corruption that the two sides should coalesce, you, Mr. Speaker, are accessory to the crime. The reading of a paper cannot be dispensed with but by the unanimous consent of the House—a vote, to which effect, you are in the daily habit of presenting to us for our approbation, which is almost constantly given. If unanimity is a mark of conspiracy, fraud, and corruption, you, Mr. Speaker, are the great sewer through which it has vent. Excuse me, sir; you know I do not apply these remarks to you as founded in fact, but merely to show the extravagance of the opinion which has been advanced on this point! What, sir, is the world to think of your conduct if it is a stain to have a vote of both parties in one's favor? Why, sir, at the last session, you had a unanimous vote of thanks for your able and impartial conduct in the Chair which you then filled, and still so honorably and advantageously fill. With these observations I will dismiss this argument, if argument it may be called.

Another remark has been made respecting the conduct of the Committee of Claims generally. It was said that that committee, regardless of the feelings of humanity, uniformly opposed the claims of our Revolutionary soldiers; that their widows and orphans' tears and supplications were disregarded; and that it was only speculators, swindlers, and public robbers whom they felt compassion for; and we were amused with the story of Magdalen charity. But if the gentleman will look forward, he will see a bill on your table from that very committee providing for these Revolutionary claims. Was it for this reason that the claim of Mrs. Elliot was resisted? Let the gentleman (Mr. NICHOLSON) say whether his eloquence was exerted on that occasion for this purpose; and let me ask who was the loudest member in resisting that claim? Sir, an opposition to that measure will have to be put into the black catalogue of your sins. Excuse this language, for you know it is only used to show the extravagance of the charge of want of humanity. Will the gentlemen from Rhode Island and Virginia be discharged from the offence of not feeling for the war-worn soldiers, their helpless widows and orphans? So much for a defence of the general character of the Committee of Claims against the charge of want of humanity!

One observation upon the assertion respecting the present applicants, who are represented as bankrupt in reputation as in fortune. If this is the case of any of them, the observations ought to be applied to the individuals and not to the whole body. Who of the applicants are the refuse of every sect and party, it lies not with me to say. Among them, however, appear characters honorable and highly esteemed in their own country. In Massachusetts, the Attorney General is one; another was an Elector at the last Presidential election; another is the District Attorney of the United States; several others occupy posts of great confidence under the State government; and some are members of the Legislature. And who are those of South Carolina? Let the gentleman from that State answer. I ask, would the gentleman from Maryland subscribe to this character on the part of the citizens who are applicants from that State? The total number is one thousand two hundred, and it is horrible to believe that there is such a multitude of unprincipled men in our young country.

The gentleman, who moved the amendment, has quoted several authorities; but I entertain doubts whether they apply to the present subject, and rather incline to believe that the doctrine contained in them applies only to the particular cases in chancery on which they were delivered, and that they are general law maxims. What he said of asking justice with clean hands and pure hearts does not apply; the question being merely, have the applicants equity to entitle them to a proffered compromise? It is admitted that where the claimant goes for the whole or nothing, any want of equity sets the whole aside. He has however candidly conceded that he was willing to make provision for innocent purchasers, if there were any. This confession his heart would not let him refuse, his head admitted the declaration and his ingenuousness has made the expression. He also adds ingenuously, that though he were willing to relieve the innocent purchasers, yet he would not do it whilst they remained in such bad company. His object is to make a discrimination; but how shall we know who are the innocent purchasers he means to save from ruin? How could the Committee of Claims or how could he himself undertake to sift and scrutinize twelve hundred claims during the present session? If then it is admitted that, among this mass of claims, there may be some proper to be relieved, will it not be the better mode to appoint men of your own choice, of sound discernment and industry, to examine the several cases, and do what is right in each? If the gentlemen could not go through these claims himself within the present session—and I doubt if he could within a year, notwithstanding his disregard of relaxation and his indefatigable application to public business; he would never require others to do that to which he found himself incompetent. Leave it, therefore, to men who are competent, and who have leisure; so that justice may be done in cases which require it, and let those who have acted wrong be neglected.

I would not be understood to say that the United States have come under any absolute engagement to meet the present claimants, but the acts of Government have held out encouragement and raised a general expectation that something will be done to quiet them. If nothing is to be done, we ought not to have put the parties to the expense and trouble of registering their claims in the Department of State.

The only purpose of the resolution is to authorize three Commissioners to receive propositions of compromise and settlement; and to adjust the same in such a manner as will conduce to the interests of the United States, and not exceed the limits prescribed by the convention with the State of Georgia; and the only difficulty will be to find three persons competent to the task. This, however, will be admitted of sufficient force to countervail the resolution.

Mr. NELSON observed, that as the gentlemen on the north side of the House were getting warm, he feared the heat might increase, and reach the south side; in order to furnish gentlemen with an opportunity of cooling, he would move an adjournment.

On the question the House divided—61 in its favor, and 51 against it. The House then adjourned.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of State, on the memorial of Stephen Sayre, of the State of New Jersey, referred to him by order of the House, on the fifteenth ultimo; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

On motion, it was

Resolved, unanimously, That SAMUEL HAMMOND, a member of this House from Georgia, having accepted an Executive appointment, has vacated his seat in this House.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing resolution be sent to the Governor of Georgia, by the Speaker of this House.

MR. J. RANDOLPH, from the committee to whom was committed, on the twenty-eighth ultimo, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to extend jurisdiction, in certain cases, to the State and Territorial Courts," reported the same to the House without amendment: Whereupon,

Ordered, That the said bill be read the third time on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act in addition to 'An act to make provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds received in the actual service of the United States, during the Revolutionary war,' to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

GEORGIA CLAIMS

The consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims on the claims on Georgia lands was resumed.

MR. HOLLAND.—MR. Speaker: When this subject was before the House at the last session, I viewed it with the utmost indignation, from an impression that the act of Georgia of 1795, for the sale of their public lands, and under which the petitioners now claim, was an act of the most corrupt Legislature on earth; and I am yet far from believing that all the members who voted in favor of that act were influenced from the purest motives. But upon an examination of the subject, in a cool and dispassionate manner, I find strong grounds for a removal of many of the prejudices that then existed in my mind. Sometime after the passage of the act of 1795, I happened to be in Georgia, and mixing with those who were unfavorable to it, I adopted a prejudice; and when the subject was brought up at the last session my original prejudice was revived and augmented from a whisper in my ear, or from my seeing it in print, that one of the Commissioners of the United States had an interest in the compromise proposed to be made. A combination of these circumstances produced on me a hasty determination never to give a vote that by any possible construction should give a sanction to a measure so originating and involved in fraud. But, sir, after having more time to examine, and on more mature deliberation, I have relaxed from the hasty determination, and have discovered that it was the result of an honest disgust arising from the circumstances that I have stated. But I have since found that many of the facts that I then relied on did not exist, and consequently that my conclusions were drawn from false premises. I have examined with care, whether the suggestion respecting the Commissioner was true. And here I ask pardon of this officer for the unfavorable impression I then entertained of him, having discovered it to be unfounded. That many of the members of the Legislature of the State of Georgia were influenced from improper, impure, and corrupt motives, I have no doubt; but that the conduct of those members, or the act which they passed, was a sufficient cause to authorize the succeeding Legislature to resort to revolutionary measures, is to my mind exceedingly doubtful. There are many causes, however, if we will take the trouble to examine them, which will in a great measure account for the extraordinary proceedings of both those Legislatures, and if their acts can be accounted for without attributing fraud to the one or tyranny to the other, that portion of charity that we are bound to extend to all mankind will impose upon us the most favorable construction. In order to understand these transactions it will be necessary to inquire into the estimated value of land, in the State of Georgia, to which the Indian claim had been extinguished, and also the estimated value of lands in question to which the Indian claim had not been extinguished for years antecedent to the disposal of them by the act of 1795; and, also, inquire whether any external causes subsequent to the act of 1795 produced a different conception relative to the value of those lands. A knowledge of these subjects may be useful, and enable us to judge more correctly and more favorably on the motives of either Legislature. The people of the State of Georgia, as well as the Legislature of the State, for years previous to the passing of the act of 1795, had set a low value upon their vacant lands—lands lying contiguous to the settlements to which the Indian title had been extinguished—lands lying this side of the Oconee. I am credibly informed, and if my information is incorrect let the gentlemen from that State correct me, lands had been sold in 1792-'93-'94 for a cent an acre; sold for a sum only contemplated to indemnify the State for the expense incidental to making titles. And as to the lands in question, their estimated value will be best known by adverting to their legislative acts; their Legislature for years had been attempting to sell these lands; in 1787 a large portion of them was offered to the United States for $171,428; and in 1799, about twenty-five millions of acres was actually sold for a little more than $200,000 to two companies, one called the South Carolina, the other the Virginia Yazoo Land Company; and in this case the land was sold on a credit, and the terms of sale not well understood; the purchasers contended that payments could be made in paper bills; but the State insisted for specie; this not being complied with, the titles were not completed by the subsequent Legislature. In 1795, the quantity of land was estimated at thirty millions of acres; the terms were cash; and the sum five hundred thousand dollars, which was paid, and the titles executed, subject to many claims derived from Spain and Great Britain, and subject to the Indian title and to the claim of the United States, as well as the claim of Spain to a part of this territory, and also subject to the sale previously made by the State in 1799 to the Virginia and South Carolina companies. It was under these circumstances and conflicting claims to the lands in question that the Legislature of 1795 sold this land. Sir, I shall not justify the conduct of any member that composed this Legislature, and I admit that all those members that were partners, or took any consideration for their votes, acted imprudently, and probably corruptly. But it is possible that even Thomas Rayburn, who appears in the most unfavorable point of light, having taken, as it is said, $600 for his share of the land, or for his vote, (for there is no legal proof,) might believe that the State was not defrauded; he might believe that $500,000, that the company was giving for the claim of Georgia to the lands in question, was more than the claim was worth. The price for which unappropriated lands had been sold, the price the State had offered to take, and the price for which Georgia had previously sold it for, authorized this belief; and that this was his belief, may be inferred from his taking $600 for seventy-five thousand acres, being 1-4 cent less per acre than the State sold it for; for it seems admitted that he had his choice to retain his share or receive the money; his choosing a less sum than the public sold it for, is an evidence of the value he set upon it, and a confirmation that he thought the land well sold. But even admitting that Rayburn, with many others, acted from impure and corrupt motives, does it follow that the State has been defrauded to so high a degree as to justify a resort to revolutionary measures? Did the peace and welfare of the State render the proceedings of the Legislature of 1796 indispensable? What was the property disposed of? Was it a country which was needed for the cultivation of her citizens? No, sir, Georgia had independent of this more vacant lands than fell to her share, or than she could cultivate for generations to come. It was a tract of country, remote from her citizens, claimed, as I have before stated, by Spain, by the United States, and possessed by powerful nations of Indians, over which Georgia had no control. It was of no use to Georgia only as an estate for sale, and she had nothing to sell but a mere nominal title, derived from a dubious construction of her original charter, and for this Georgia received, when in great need of money, $500,000—a much greater sum than it had been previously proposed for or expected to bring. We have now seen the causes that produced this sale under the act of 1795; let us examine what probably produced the act of 1796. The deprecated act passed January, 1795, in the same year an office was opened for the sale of the public lands of the United States; these lands were to be sold for two dollars per acre, and as much more as they would bring. The vast disproportion in the price of these lands, and the price which the Legislature of 1795, of the State of Georgia, had sold their lands, could not well be accounted for by the people of Georgia other than fraud. Fraud was suggested; a single suggestion in a case of this kind is sufficient. Nothing is so disgusting as for our agents, especially in a legislative capacity, to sacrifice from mercenary motives our interests, and be guilty of a breach of trust. Suspicions will now be admitted as full proof; the torrent went on; the belief became general, that by fraud the Legislature of 1795 had bartered off in the most fraudulent manner millions of acres of the realized property of the State. Under this ideal impression, occasioned in a great degree by the causes I have just mentioned, the people of Georgia were misled, and under this impulse the Legislature of 1796 proceeded, and the honest zeal continued until the subsequent conviction. The people of Georgia were not alone misled by the price of the public lands. It inspired an opinion in the minds of the best informed throughout the Union, that fortunes could instantly be made in purchasing lands from the State for a few cents per acre, and then disposing of them much under the public price. Companies engaged; the land laws of South Carolina were peculiarly favorable; the adventurers had a year's credit for the payment of the purchase money, which was about five cents per acre, and, notwithstanding the enthusiasm, the Legislature did not alter the terms, nor raise the price. Under these fair appearances, many companies formed, who were styled land speculators, throughout the Union, but the consequence was a general failure, a general bankruptcy. One company I was well acquainted with, being in my district, in the county of Wilkes, embarked under the fairest prospects; they were generally men of reputation, influence, and wealth; they entered some millions of acres, but, after having spent much time and money, they were unable to realize their expectations, and found it advisable to apply to the General Assembly to have leave to surrender their lands as an indemnity for the State demands against them in the entrytaker's books, and this was granted as a matter of special favor. I have mentioned these circumstances to show what it was that made the act of Georgia of 1795 so obnoxious to the people of that State; and I am strongly induced to believe that had it not been for the price the General Government set upon her lands in 1795, we should have heard but little concerning the corruption of the Legislature of the State of Georgia in 1795, nor ever have heard of the rescinding act of 1796, nor should we ever have been called upon to sanction an act produced from an overheated zeal arising from a combination of circumstances above stated, to sanction an act that would establish a precedent of a most dangerous nature.

Sir, if the doctrine was once recognised, that a subsequent could examine the motives of an antecedent Legislature, there would be no security for the rights of persons or the rights of property. I do not pretend to say, that there is no case that would not justify a recurrence to revolutionary measures; all that I contend for is that this is not a case of that kind; the manner of the sale and the property sold were not so materially connected with the interest of the State as to require a revolution, and I have endeavored to account for the sale of 1795, and the unprecedented and extraordinary act of 1796, from other causes than attributing universal depravity in the one, and absolute tyranny in the other Legislature. There might be other causes in addition to those I have mentioned, that led to and produced those measures, which I shall not notice. But it was declared by the Legislature of Georgia of 1796, that the Legislature of 1795 had no constitutional power to dispose of those lands, and the same doctrine seems to be advocated by gentlemen on this occasion. It is true that there is no specific power given by the constitution of Georgia to their Legislature, enabling them to make a sale of those lands, nor is there such specification of power in any of the State constitutions, nor in the Constitution of the General Government, yet all the States as well as the General Government have been in the constant exercise of this power. The State of Georgia had previously exercised it; indeed this power is incidental to the legislative authority of every free Government. I therefore consider all objections on the ground of the Legislature of Georgia not having a constitutional authority to dispose of the lands in question of little validity. And I know of no legitimate power that has a right to examine into the motives of the legislative authority of a country: their motives are only to be known by their public acts, and the meaning of those acts so far as they relate to property acquired under them are not to be expounded by a subsequent Legislature, but by the judicial authority of the country. Thus, sir, I have shown the original value of the land in the State of Georgia anterior to the act of 1795, and have demonstrated that the sale under that act was for a much higher price than had been previously asked by the State for those lands, and have endeavored to account for the change of opinion as to the value of lands generally, and the causes that produced so great fermentation and disgust in the people; that the injury was more ideal than real, that the State of Georgia had nothing but a nominal title to the lands in question, and that by the constitution she had a right to dispose of this nominal title in the manner it was disposed of, and that no subsequent Legislature had a right to judge of the motives of an antecedent Legislature, or to impair the rights assumed under a legislative act. I have admitted that there might be a possible case that might justify a recourse to revolutionary measures. But I have shown that the interest of the State did not require it in the present case. And although it may be possible that neither the original grantees nor the sub-purchasers could have any legal remedy in or by the laws of the State of Georgia, as by the act of 1796, judicial remedy seems to be forbidden—yet, sir, in a court possessed of ample judicial power, I have no doubt but that an equitable and just remedy would be obtained, if not to the original grantees, to all innocent purchasers, at least. And here let me observe that it seems to be admitted by gentlemen that innocent purchasers are entitled to an equitable consideration; but they have endeavored to prove that there is none of this description, and that all the petitioners had notice of the original fraud. To prove this notice two cases are relied on. Two gentlemen (Messrs. CLARK and RANDOLPH) from Virginia contended, that the President's Message to Congress on the 17th of February, 1795, is full proof of a notice of fraud. Sir, I consider this communication in a very different point of view. In this Message the President states, that Georgia had passed an act for the disposal of some of their back lands; this communication was evidently intended to excite Congress to adopt measures to induce the State of Georgia to cede to the United States a part of her territory; it is an admission of title in the State, and consequently an admission of a right to sell. So far as this goes (and it is of high authority) it is to my mind a notice of a good title in Georgia, and an inducement to purchase. At all events, it could not by any possibility be construed into a notice of fraud, either in the Legislature or the patentees of the State of Georgia.

The other ground of notice is relied on by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. GREGG;) this honorable member states that the deeds obtained from the original patentees are to his mind an evidence and notice of fraud, for that these deeds only convey and guarantee against the State of Georgia. These deeds, like others to lands similarly circumstanced, were not a general but a special warranty; the patentees would have involved themselves extremely had they given any other kind of deeds. The lands in question were known to be subject to sundry claims, and actually encumbered with the Indian title. I was a patentee for a grant of five thousand acres of land derived from an entry made at Hillsboro, being the great office in North Carolina for her western lands, now within the State of Tennessee. Soon after I obtained this grant I sold the land, and from an apprehension that by some arrangement this tract might be subject to the Indian title, I had a similar limitation or provision in the deed. A deed of this kind is evidence of an encumbered estate, but can be no evidence of a fraudulent title. The same gentleman is apprehensive that the sole object of the memorialists is to procure a legislative proposition for the purpose of giving it in evidence in a judicial trial, that is intended to be instituted for the recovery of their whole demand of fifty millions of acres. Had the gentleman paid a little more attention to this point he would have dismissed his fears, it being a settled principle that any propositions that are made for the settling disputes or to avoid a law-suit cannot be admitted as evidence to substantiate a disputed or invalid title. A gentleman up early in this debate, (Mr. LUCAS,) denounced the policy of granting large tracts or monopolies. With whatever force his arguments would have applied had he been in the Georgia Legislature of 1795, when these monopolies were granted, they most certainly can have no application here; the question here is not for granting a monopoly of fifty million of acres,

Georgia Claims.

it is the reverse, it is the destroying a monopoly by frittering down fifty to less than five million of acres. And in this lies the policy. It is policy in the General Government to quiet the claimants that possess titles to so vast a tract of country; it is policy to avoid, if possible, a judicial decision on this question by a compromise; and it is also justice to do so. The measures that have been adopted by Georgia as well as by the General Government demand this justice at our hands; an examination of the course that has been taken will demonstrate that we have given them ground to expect an equitable compensation for their claims. The State of Georgia has relaxed from their rigorous act of 1796. In their convention with the United States they have set apart the residue of five millions of acres for the purpose of quieting all claims derived from any act or pretended act of the State of Georgia. Can any gentleman say that these claims were not included? The State of Georgia by their Legislature ratified this provision; Congress by their act did the same thing; they did more, they appointed three commissioners to receive propositions of compromise, and further directed all claimants to record the evidence of their claims within a fixed and limited period, and this has been done at the expense of the claimants; and can we now without a dereliction of principle, retract and say that no compromise shall be? Would this be a conduct consistent with justice or policy? So far as I am able to comprehend it, I think it would not. I think we should proceed and put an end to this business and at all events grant some indemnification to innocent purchasers. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. CLARK) has admitted that innocent purchasers should be indemnified, and were they to apply individually he would make them compensation; and the cases cited from Powell on Contracts recognise the principle, that fraudulent contracts are valid as to the originals in fraud, but are voidable in favor of innocent persons. But the cases read only apply to individual contracts, and never can be supposed to extend to a fraud supposed to be committed by a Legislature. It is believed that no precedent can be found under the sun in which the Judiciary can purge a fraud supposed to be committed by a sovereign legislative body. Under these considerations I think that it would be more consistent with justice and sound policy to go on and not disappoint a reasonable expectation that our public acts have justly excited in the memorialists, and prevent the danger of a judicial decision on the validity of their titles by the compromise proposed by the report of the Committee of Claims. Let us constitute a Board of Commissioners to make the inquiry, and if there are but three innocent sufferers who became such by placing such a faith upon the records of the State of Georgia, as by the Constitution and laws of the United States they were bound to do, these three persons, agreeably to a correct opinion given by the chairman of the Committee of Claims who made this report, are entitled to indemnification. Thus, Mr. Speaker, I have in as concise and intelligible a manner as

I have been able, given to the House some of the reasons that will influence me on this occasion, and I entertain a hope that if they are not satisfactory to gentlemen who think differently, that at least I shall be rescued in the mind of those gentlemen who have supposed that many of those who are in favor of this measure are under the influence of speculators, or men in office; but if I am so unfortunate as to be suspected by any as acting under this influence, I have the consolation to know that the suspicion is the production of a heart susceptible of this kind of influence, and not attached to me. I shall however in the meantime vote for the resolution, holding myself at liberty to vote for or against the bill, as I shall approve or disapprove of its details.

Mr. DAWSON.—Mr. Speaker, I am among those who have never considered this as a very important question, at least not so much so as some gentlemen wish to represent it. I believe that neither the peace or safety of the United States, or the cause of republicanism, depend on the adoption or rejection of that resolution, or of its proposed substitute. I believe they rest on a better foundation: the virtue and good sense of the American people. I do also believe, that, if there ever was a question which could be considered as not a party one, this is that question; notwithstanding the efforts of gentlemen to make it so. Some local considerations may attach themselves to it; for the truth is, that the knowing ones of the East have been taken in by some corrupt ones from the South; and thus far it may be said to possess locality. The case is, that some years ago the Government of the United States purchased from our sister State of Georgia, then sovereign and independent, her right to certain lands claimed by her, and lying within her limits. A convention was formed between the United States and the State of Georgia. By that convention, five millions of acres of the said land were set apart to satisfy just claims, derived either from the State of Georgia itself, or from the power having a right to sell, previous to her becoming a State.

To ascertain which of the claims were just, and ought to be admitted agreeably to the intention of the contracting parties, and the spirit of the convention, the President of the United States was authorized to appoint commissioners. By virtue of this power, an appointment was made. Three persons were selected, pre-eminent for their virtues and their talents. The Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General of the United States; men not only pre-eminent for their virtues and their talents, but holding the highest responsible offices under the Government. Men, not only fitted for the appointment by these considerations, but from one other; they were the very persons who formed the convention with the State of Georgia, and must be supposed to know the intention of the contracting parties, and the spirit of the instrument.

These gentlemen, after much investigation, submitted to us the result of their labors, accompanied by an opinion, that justice, and the interest of the United States, required that some compensation should be made to the persons who are now the immediate applicants. This report was not acted upon during the last session, and the petitioners now pray that we will either confirm that report, that we will permit them to go into a court to support their claim according to law, or that we will establish a tribunal ourselves, to determine on it according to justice. The Committee of Claims has recommended the latter. To their proposition, an amendment has been offered, (and which, in my judgment, according to order, is the only subject now under consideration,) which goes not only to a rejection of the report of the Commissioners; not only to a rejection of the claim of the applicants; but to a denial to them to go either into a court of law, or before a tribunal of justice, to support their claims either at law or according to justice. And to this amendment I am most decidedly opposed, whatever my vote may be on the resolution, or rather upon the bill which shall grow out of that resolution. That, sir, will depend on the provisions of the bill; my object is justice, agreeably to the intention of the contracting parties. If a bill can be formed which shall give relief to innocent and distressed purchasers, if any such there are, it shall have my hearty support; if it shall cover fraud or encourage speculation, it shall receive my negative. Mr. Speaker, I have not been induced to make this avowal of my sentiments, and of the line of conduct which I mean to pursue, in consequence of any of the extraordinary observations which I have heard during this tedious debate; more extraordinary indeed than any which I ever heard, even during the height of Federal intemperance. I was grieved to hear them. Sir, during this discussion, this hall, into which it is presumed that no one comes "whose hands are not clean and whose heart pure," has been filled with the sounds of suspicion, insinuation, bribery, corruption, treason, robbery, and that long catalogue of black crimes, the recollection of which fills the mind with horror, and the mention of which ought to palsy the innocent tongue. A stranger coming within these walls would indeed suppose that he had entered a den of robbers, and not into the sanctuary of the Representatives of a free and virtuous people.

From whence, I pray you, sir, has this arisen? Do gentlemen believe that personal insinuations, acrimonious sayings, and inflated declamation, give force to an argument, dignity to a proceeding, or influence a decision? They may sometimes wound the feelings of an individual, but generally give ease or pleasure to those only who utter them. With me, they pass by as the idle wind which I respect not; or, if they have any influence, it is to confirm me in my opinion, by lessening those who resort to them for lack of argument—by lessening the regret which I feel for separating from those with whom, in general, it is my pleasure to act.

Armed, sir, with the convictions of my own mind, unshielded during my life by others, and unconnected during that time in speculation, even to the amount of one sous, and believing that not a friend, not a connexion, not a constituent that I have, are interested in the rejection or adoption of this report, or, Mr. Speaker, of any of the other claims, I am left free to pursue that course which I deem for the public good; and, for one, at least, of the opponents to the amendment, I am as willing to submit my public conduct, and my political principles to any tribunal, and as ready to support them here, there, or elsewhere, as any of its advocates.

True republicanism, in my judgment, consists in moderation, in humanity, in justice, and in honor. Humanity and justice command the rejection of that amendment; the interest and honor of our country support the other, and I trust with confidence that a large majority of this House will obey the sacred mandate.

I repeat, that my object is to protect innocence and to punish vice. If a bill can be formed to afford relief to innocent and distressed purchasers, it shall have my hearty support; if it goes to the protection and encouragement of vice or speculation, I shall be found in the foremost rank in opposition. I am willing to make the experiment.

Mr. NELSON said he would not, in imitation of the gentleman just sat down, address the passions of the members with the sweet-scented flowers of eloquence, but he would in plain and homespun language make an appeal to their understandings; and he hoped to be able to demonstrate that the present claimants, one and all, were not entitled to a single foot of the land in question, in point of national justice, in point of law, and in point of equity, and that if Congress granted their request they would do an act of high injustice to the whole body politic of the nation.

It astonished me, said Mr. N., to hear the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. HOLLAND) arguing in justification of the Legislature of Georgia, which made the fraudulent and villanous contract with the Yazoo speculators of 1795, and were I to go into an argument to prove his mistake, I should be deemed one of the most absurd of mankind. I should be endeavoring to prove what no man will deny. Every gentleman I have heard on this floor, except himself, and every one out of doors, nay even the claimants themselves, admit the corrupt views of the Legislature of 1795, and the fraudulent means employed by the speculators; a justification of such a contract coming from that respectable gentleman has indeed astonished me. Why, sir, the claimants rest their claim upon the ground of being innocent purchasers, admitting thereby that their grantors were rogues. If it be now admitted, and I believe it will be admitted by every gentleman in this House, except the gentleman from North Carolina, that those men calling themselves the Legislature of Georgia did make a fraudulent contract—a contract they were not authorized by the Constitution, nor called upon by the people to make, and which they could not make, with a set of unprincipled men as bad as themselves—if it be admitted that the contract was fraudulent, and made without power, it was void ab initio, in fact it never was a contract.

Georgia Claims.

H. OF R.

What was the power of the Legislature under the Constitution? Why, to make good and wholesome laws, to advance the happiness and secure the prosperity of the citizens. The Legislature is to be considered the mere agent of the people, not their master. If, as an agent, it made a contract that was fair, or perhaps feasible, and within their powers of agency, it would be binding upon the principal. Such is the doctrine of agency in public as well as in private life. But if I authorize an agent to do certain things for my benefit, and he is detected in a combination with three or four other rascals making a contract to cheat and defraud me of my personal estate, over which I had given him no authority, shall such a contract, though sanctioned with all the forms of law, be binding upon me, and shall I lose my estate by their knavery? No, sir, a court of justice, law, or equity, would equally scout the idea. Yes, sir, I aver it, and will maintain it, that from the moment the Legislature abandoned, or ceased to regard the interests of the people, which was the true rule of their conduct, from that moment they ceased to be the representatives of the people of Georgia, and all their acts done contrary to those interests were null and void.

If the act of 1795 was null and void, as I contend it was, and as every gentleman but one has admitted to be the case, then, I ask, how are the present applicants the innocent purchasers they claim to be? Why, sir, if this tract of country, which gentlemen tell us contains 50,000,000 or 40,000,000 of acres, was on and before the year 1795 the property of the people of Georgia, and the Legislature had no right to dispose of the same, and the people have never authorized a conveyance, I would ask whose it is at present? Why, sir, it belongs to the people of Georgia; the fraudulent claim of the claimants, called the Massachusetts' Mississippi Land Company to the contrary notwithstanding. Yet some gentlemen hint that the Legislature of 1796 had no right to rescind the act of 1795. Sir, they did not rescind this act, but passed a law declaratory of the nature of the act of 1795, that it never was of any avail, that it never did exist, that it was void ab initio, and that the representatives pretending to make it never were vested with any power on that subject. And all this is verified by the course which was taken by the people afterwards. They assembled in convention to revise and alter their constitution, and in that constitution they have incorporated the declaratory act of 1796, as an indelible mark of their approbation. Will gentlemen say that the people of Georgia have not a right to change or abolish their constitution for their own security, or for the promotion of their own welfare? I believe the right will not be denied, and they have exercised it. I cannot see after this, what ground of law, justice, or equity, the applicants can find to fix their claims upon. A great outcry has been made that they are innocent purchasers, and ought not to suffer for the faults of others. This outcry may take in a few weak men, but certainly this House, with a full knowledge of all the facts, are not to be swayed from the true balance of public and distributive justice. The number of innocent persons concerned in this transaction may be more or less. I know them not, and have only seen the names of two men; these call themselves agents, but agents of whom? Agents of the New England Mississippi Land Company. If we could learn the names of the members of this New England Mississippi Land Company, we might, from our personal knowledge, or from common report, form some idea of their standing in life. But no, sir, they do not present their petition on their individual subscription, but artfully and cunningly conceal themselves under the cloak of their agents; and to be sure, under the cloak of those gentlemen's names, they may talk of innocence. I am sorry to say it, but I can know no man when I stand on this floor to pass between the claimants and the people of the United States, that it looks too much like trick and concealment. All is not fair, or they would be open and above board in their application to the National Legislature.

I believe if the names of the applicants were disclosed, we might find among them some men of worth and talents, but I believe, at the same time, we should be able to trace the names of some of the greatest and most desperate speculators, remarkable for their success in preying on the indigent. We should very probably find some of those persons in connexion with those who preyed upon your Revolutionary soldiers, and obtained their final settlement certificates for a mess of pottage; the universal abhorrence which is now entertained of such characters would condemn their claims, almost unheard to the flames. Ah! sir, is there not something deep to be suspected when such names are concealed from the knowledge of this House? Viewing the subject in this light, I cannot consider the applicants as innocent purchasers, but rather as taking this color in order to avoid detection. How stands the fact? So far as we are informed, a set of men, combined from various parts of the Union, practised upon a weak and corrupt legislative body in Georgia, to get an act or pretended act to pass for the disposal of a vast territory—travel to the North, and there with others of their associates, contrive to change the names of the holders of the property, in order that they may get their heads out of the halter, and leave it upon the innocent purchaser to procure what they knew they themselves would never be able to obtain. I look upon the case to be something like the thief who having stolen a horse, and being likely to be taken, dismounts, and gives the horse to an honest countryman he has overtaken, with a request that he would walk him along the road to the next tavern, where he will wait for him. So the first set of speculators upon Georgia have made a third person an innocent purchaser, that they may obtain from this House what they well knew they never could obtain in their own right. I say this looks too much like trickery; but it is, I trust, a trick too stale to impose upon the Congress of the United States. It is, I trust, a trick, sir, as old as the settlement of New England itself, and will not pass beyond its boundaries.

But let us take these innocent purchasers on their own ground. An innocent purchaser may be defined a person who verily believes that the party selling, has a fair and legal title to what he is about to dispose of. Now will this cap fit the New England Mississippi Land Company? No, sir, it will not. On the very face of the deed conveying the land, the brand of the fraud is found. Not a man that reads the deed but can see the fraud. Was it ever known that when a man buys land he is willing to take a special warrantee, when he can have a general warrantee? But, sir, admitting that such might be the case, was it ever known that a man was willing to take a title without any warrantee whatever? Nay, worse than no warrantee, that he would, after paying his money, consent to stand in the shoes of another with all its risks and hazards, of which he has not even the smallest knowledge. Was such a man to come to you, Mr. Speaker, and make you such a proposition for the sale of an estate, would you not instantly conceive that the man was a rogue and meant to swindle you out of your money, or that he thought you a fool easily to be imposed upon? If this was not the course of thought your mind would pursue, what else could be your opinion of a proposition to stipulate such a covenant as there is recited in the deeds of the New England Mississippi Land Company? Their covenants say that they shall stand in the place and stead of the original grantees. If, then, the grant was not good in the original grantees, how, in the name of common sense, can it be good to those who by express covenant undertake to stand in their identical place and stead? If you state, sir, that you have no title, and yet I agree to give you money for a conveyance, and oblige myself to stand in your shoes, it is plain that I have not purchased any title. This, sir, is plain, sound sense, intelligible to every farmer and mechanic in the United States, as well as the lawyers at the bar. This covenant is their deed, and it appears to me that the purchasers were willing to enter on a gambling speculation of this kind. We will give one hundredth part of the value for your title, be it such as it is. If we lose; we lose little, if we win we make a great estate. Sir, this spirit leads on to a practice well known to happen every day. A man buys a ticket in a lottery, expecting to win the $50,000 prize. Hundreds and thousands engage in the purchase of tickets; yet there is but one $50,000 prize; and as all, except one, must miss of their aim, they ought and I believe they generally do set themselves down contented, although disappointed in their expectation. So, sir, was the case with the New England Mississippi Land Company, they no doubt expected to make twenty times, or a hundred times the amount of the money they risked in the Georgia land lottery; but they have drawn a blank, and ought to be content. Sir, it was nothing more than a gambling match between the gamblers of the North, and the gamblers of the South. For this time the South has won; perhaps the North may on the next gambling match recover or double their stakes. As to the speculators from the South, they had the advantage in the toss up; they said heads, I win; tails, you lose: they could not lose anything for they had nothing at stake. A gentleman who I have in my eye says, he pities these people; if he would condescend to take a view of them from the elevated stand I have taken, he would see little occasion for pity; he would no longer view them as innocent purchasers, but as gambling speculators, who, having adventured in a play they did not completely understand, have lost the game, and now, like gamblers of the lowest degree, they apply to Congress to return them their money.

The title of these men, as decided by the Commissioners, and as yielded by themselves, is neither legal nor equitable; they only claim on the ground of policy. I do not understand that policy. If I have a title to an estate, I claim the whole, I never compromise. If these persons are entitled to the fifty millions of acres, I say in God's name give it them; do not bring them down to five millions, or less. When they apply to this House for this small pittance of their claim, every one must conceive that they do it in consequence of a defective title. The men, whose names I have seen, are not the kind of men to compound; I am surprised that they would put up with such a scanty provision, they generally, I think, exact to the last farthing. These innocent purchasers of fifty millions of acres of land, who claim your pity, and ask for a part of five millions of acres, are men, that if I do anything for, it shall be justice. What kind of justice would this be considered in common life? My worthy friend from Baltimore, sells me goods to the amount of £500; I tell him I am able to pay him the whole, but then it will be justice to pay him only £5. What would he or the world think of me for such conduct? Congress, to be sure, is a liberal body; I look round this chamber to see the men, who make donations; five millions of acres, with ten millions of dollars to be given—to whom?—and for what? During the short time I have had the honor of a seat on this floor, I have been in the habit of presenting petitions, memorials, applications, &c., for a number of my old brother soldiers, worn down by disease and poverty, who have established the liberty, the independence, and the Government of this country. I have never seen the Committee of Claims, to whom these petitions have been generally referred, recommend the allowance of a single cent; but your purse-proud Yazoo speculators are to have ten millions of dollars, because they have the presumption to ask for it. O tempora! O mores!

Mr. SLOAN.—Mr. Speaker, in the course of this debate, the time of the House taken up by the supporters of the resolution has been six hours and thirty-three minutes; and by the opposers five hours and two minutes, leaving a balance in our favor of one hour and thirty-one minutes. Hence, agreeable to equal justice, it is our turn now.

FEBRUARY, 1805.

Georgia Claims.

H. OF R.

I shall first observe that none more than I regret the great warmth that has appeared in debating upon this important subject:—No less important than whether the present Congress will in any degree sanction an act which a former Congress has unequivocally declared to be fraudulent; and therefore to all intents and purposes null and void. This I take to be a true state of the question.

Respecting the warmth that has appeared, and which I acknowledge to have risen to too great a height; yet I believe it to have been the product of an honest zeal in the opposers of the resolution, from a conviction of the speculative degree of fraud that evidently appears in the Legislature of Georgia, and the original contractors of 1795; and, therefore, ought to be looked upon with a charitable eye; more especially when full retaliation has been made by the supporters of the resolution. Upon this subject, I shall only notice, hereafter, some ungenerous allusions made yesterday to my worthy friend from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) whose exertions in the sacred cause of liberty rendered his name dear to me, long before I had the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with him.

It has been said, that the perpetrators, or at least parties to this act, are men of the first respectability in the Union. To this I answer, that I do not know them; nor do I wish to know any man whilst sitting in the seat of judgment. But, granting the fact, does it sanctify the act? Is a fraudulent act less injurious to the community, for being perpetrated by a person or persons that once possessed the confidence of the people, or by being clothed in purple and fine linen? God forbid that ever such a sentiment should have place within these walls.

In the course of this debate, some represented the New England speculators as very wise; and others have represented them extremely ignorant. Permit me also to give my opinion, which is, that, if their virtue was equal to their knowledge, they would shine as stars of the first magnitude in the firmament of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I desire that what I shall say upon this subject, may be considered as pointed at principles that I conceive to be wrong; and not at individuals, otherwise than as those individuals espouse and defend such principles.

Believing, as I do, that speculation has heretofore brought our country to the brink of ruin, I hope charitable allowance will be made, if in my subsequent observations I treat the subject (in the opinion of some) too severely.

An allusion was made yesterday to my friend from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) which I considered ungenerous; it was an intimation that he had borne no part in the Revolutionary war. Mr. Speaker, if patriotism is confined to those only who took an active part in that war, soon, very soon indeed, will patriotism be banished from within these walls. Yet a little space, until the all-conquering and irresistible scythe of Time will cut down all the noble patriots who took an active part therein, and number them with the silent dead!

We were also told by a member from Vermont,
8th CON. 2d SES.—37

(Mr. ELLIOT,) from what source the greatest evil and injury to republicanism proceeds; viz: from such demagogues as the member from Virginia before alluded to (Mr. RANDOLPH.) But, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the high ground on which that member stands, and his present exalted station, from whence he looks down upon the stripling and his friends; as one did in days of old upon little David; and notwithstanding his supposed superior strains of eloquence, in which he has so emphatically pointed out the late reign of terror, and the proposed union of honest men; as, in this happy land of liberty, infallibility is attached to none, I shall take the freedom of opposing my opinion to his, and say, that not an extreme degree of honest zeal for justice—although the same may not only have scorched the costly robes of speculators, but have caused the body to smart—is the most dangerous source of evil to these United States; but the supporters of speculation, and speculators—those most dangerous enemies of the just principles of our Declaration of Independence. This is the real source of danger, the Pandora's box from which our greatest national evils have and do proceed.

I cannot boast of being a soldier in the Revolutionary war, having been educated in a principle that doth not admit of bearing arms; but, Mr. Speaker, we have had a second revolution, from the powers of a host of speculators, who, as I have before mentioned, brought our country to the brink of ruin. Of the reign of terror that preceded this revolution, I can speak experimentally, having been threatened with imprisonment, and death, for my opposition to the party then in power. My wife and tender offspring were terrified with threats of my being executed for high treason, my estate confiscated, and they reduced, from a comfortable competency, to poverty and want. By whom was this dreadful dilemma, this reign of terror produced? I answer by speculators and their supporters. But a glorious revolution has been effected, not by force of arms, but by the power of truth and reason, those bloodless conquerors, more powerful than the sword! In this revolution my young friend from Virginia, before-mentioned, bore a conspicuous part, and remains a zealous supporter of the just principles by which it was effected.

In the course of this debate, preaching has been mentioned. I do not mean to pursue that mode, but shall nevertheless mention a sentence contained in that good old book, so frequently quoted, but whose excellent precepts are too little regarded. It is in the proverbs of Solomon, which my father frequently recommended to my perusal, when but a little boy. The author mentions several great evils which in that day were common amongst men. I shall mention one great evil, which in modern days is common amongst men; that is, for men, after they become vested with legislative or executive authority, to countenance, encourage, and sanction by law, those things which they reprobated in others, when they were in power. Is not this observation verified in the United States at this time? We have reprobated the law of primogeniture in England, by which the land obtained under the feudal system, is retained in a few hands; also, their chartered boroughs, moneyed aristocracy, &c. And are not we encouraging and increasing them? And have we not already heard within these walls the alarming doctrine, that a charter once granted cannot be disannulled?

In this happy country, land is equally divided, and it is evident that in those States where the land is divided into small farms, and generally occupied by the proprietors, it is in the highest state of cultivation, and most productive. But, Mr. Speaker, so long as the human species remains liable to corruption, and to be seduced by pride, and an insatiable thirst for riches and power, so long will individuals be striving to destroy this equilibrium, on which depend the peace, liberty, and happiness of mankind. To effect their evil purpose in the United States, the most powerful engines are paper and land speculation. The latter of these, though more slow in its operation, is more certain and therefore more dangerous. It is, in my opinion, the most potent enemy we have to encounter, and most likely to produce in future ages what God grant may never be the case in this land, a numerous train of poor tenants, coming in the most abject manner to my Lord Nightingale, my Lord Scott, &c.

I did not expect, Mr. Speaker, that any member on this floor would have undertaken to support the principle of speculation, but, as that ground has been taken, and the highest authority in the United States adduced to support it, viz: the purchase of Louisiana, it becomes necessary to analyze both the causes and effects of the two cases, and thereby discover what analogy or likeness they bear to each other; and first, let us inquire what led to the purchase of Louisiana? The best answer to this query will be found in the debates of a former Congress, wherein all the learning, talents, and eloquence of divers members were strenuously exerted, and from the length of their speeches, I conclude, exhausted, to prove the absolute necessity of the United States to own the east side of the Mississippi, and the navigation thereof, alleging that it was the key and door of our western country; that we had nothing in our power to give as an equivalent by way of purchase, and, therefore, must take possession of it by force of arms. Was this the case with the New England Yazoo speculators, at more than one thousand miles distance? Was it the key or door through which it was necessary for them to transport the produce of their farms? Again, let me ask, was Louisiana purchased as property only for the President and Senate who ratified the treaty, or for every free citizen of the United States? I suppose the latter, in which opinion I am supported by a law of last session of Congress, declaring null and void all grants for land, above five thousand acres to one person; from which it appears not to be intended as an article of speculation.

I shall dismiss this subject with observing, that the human mind must turn indignant from a comparison of an act the most laudable and most praiseworthy that ever adorned the pages of American history, with an act universally acknowledged to have originated in fraud; and, as such, merits the detestation of every honest citizen. Yes, Mr. Speaker, when speculators shall be consigned to the contempt they justly merit, the purchase of Louisiana shall be recorded in the book of chronicles of the United States, as chief of the noble acts of, and under the administration of that great and magnanimous benefactor of mankind, our present Chief Magistrate.

I shall now proceed to a brief investigation of the legality of the Yazoo claims. It has been alleged that the Legislature of Georgia had a right to convey the land now claimed by the New England Mississippi Company. Granted, had the sale of the land been made honestly to the highest bidder, and upon the most advantageous terms for the benefit of the State, but not in the fraudulent manner in which the sale of the land now in dispute was made, wherein the Legislature who passed the act were purchasers themselves. In this sentiment I am supported by the highest authority, viz: the Congress of the United States, who have, since the fraudulent, pretended act of Georgia, on which the present claim is founded, purchased of said State the same tract of land. Now, if the sale to the Yazoo companies was just and valid, it necessarily follows that any subsequent purchase by Congress must be invalid, fraudulent, and unjust, and the United States a party to that fraud.

Mr. Speaker: Fully convinced that there is no legal claim, I beg the attention of the House to a brief investigation of the supposed equity of this claim. Our passions have been addressed by a member from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERTS,) in behalf of thousands of innocent sufferers. From this great number, one case has been selected; and, from the ingenuity and usual accuracy of the aforesaid member, there is no doubt but, out of so great a number, he has selected the one best adapted to his purpose. Let us analyze this case, and, when reduced to first principles, see what claim there is in it to the equity and justice of this House. It is a widow, who, we are told, has lost $80,000. By what means? By her husband purchasing as much of this land, at sixteen cents per acre, as amounted to upwards of $60,000; thereby putting into the pockets of the original speculators more than $50,000 in one sale, giving about seven times the original price for land yet in possession of the Indians.

Hence, it appears that this purchase was not made with a view of settlement, but upon a principle of speculation. Has this case a claim upon the equity of Congress? No more, in my opinion, than any other species of gambling, whereby a widow and children may have been injured in their property. Such cases, indeed, merit pity; but if Congress undertakes to reimburse every widow, whose husband has lost his property by gambling, we shall soon have an empty Treasury. It is said there are innocent purchasers. None such, in my opinion, has been made appear. I believe there are very few, if any; and if any there be, having been injured by swindlers of their own State, to then let them look for redress.

I shall now proceed to some remarks on the narrative of the predisposing causes and sale of the land now in dispute, given by my worthy friend from Pennsylvania, to which, from his usual accuracy and correctness, I give full credit; and if, in the course of my observations, I should bring into view the conduct of any who are gone from works to future rewards, I beg the members of this House to bear in mind that the conduct of deceased persons, connected with the subject in dispute, was first brought into view by the supporters of the resolution. To proceed: My worthy friend, before mentioned, (Mr. FINDLEY,) has not given us an abstruse clue, whereby we may unravel the mystery of iniquity, but presented us with a fair, complete, and finished portrait; he did not present us a key, but himself opened wide the door, and presented to our view the nefarious kennel—the Pandora's box—that contained more evil in the same space than was ever before known in the U. States, or I hope ever will be again. He tells us that not the long-legged speculators of the North came to Georgia, but the speculators of Georgia went to the State of Massachusetts. Who were those speculators? The Chief Justice of the United States and a Senator of the State of Georgia. Does the exalted station of those speculators lessen the fraud? No, Mr. Speaker, but in my opinion greatly increases it, and proves beyond a doubt that the Southern and Northern speculators acted in concert, and that for years they had been hovering over and with eagle eye watching their destined prey; and as soon as the Southern vultures found means to strike their horrid talons into it—knowing they could not in peace devour it in the South—they swiftly flew with it to their associates in Northern regions, the farthest boundaries of the United States.

The foregoing portrait exposes clearly to view the whole transaction, and in my opinion fully removes the plea of ignorance, and clearly proves it to have been a long-premeditated and preconcerted plan of the most fraudulent species of speculation that ever disgraced the annals of history. Upon the whole, it appears to me in so monstrous and horrid a shape, that I know of no name in modern language by which it can be properly described. I must therefore recur to the language of the ancients, and describe it under the similitude of the great red dragon, which St. John the Divine saw, having seven heads and ten horns, who with his tail drew down to the earth a third part of the stars of heaven! Has not this been literally fulfilled in our land? Has not this horrid monster drawn down, from a station where they once shone as stars of the first magnitude, a third part of those entrusted by the people with Legislative or Executive authority, even to the earth; insomuch, that, deluded by the glittering appearance of worldly pomp and show, and actuated by an insatiable thirst after earthly treasure, they have preferred their own emolument, and the prospect of raising their posterity to opulence and power, to the peace, happiness, and prosperity of the United States—as, in the present case, betraying the trust reposed in them, and sacrificing the interests of their constituents, at the shrine of fraudulent speculation? I shall conclude with fervent prayers on behalf of this beloved country that gave me birth, that the mighty Angel of Justice may speedily lay hold of this dragon, bind him with a massy chain, and cast him into the bottomless pit, there to remain, not merely one thousand years, but for ever and ever!

Before I sit down, I shall observe, that notwithstanding I shall vote against the present resolution, if a resolution is introduced for the purpose of bringing in a bill appointing commissioners to investigate the different claims, and select just claims and innocent sufferers' cases, if any such there be, with the proof thereof, to lay before Congress at their next session, in order to be then provided for and finally settled, such a bill shall have my support.

Mr. FINDLEY said that, after the attention he had experienced in communicating his opinions on this subject two days ago, it was with reluctance he called their attention a second time to the same question. He would not have done it if the opposition had been conducted in the usual manner, and if such honorable notice had not been taken of himself, while most of his arguments remained unrefuted, and some of them wholly avoided. His colleague (Mr. CLAY) had lamented the want of unanimity in the members from Pennsylvania, and particularly the want of his own vote. Mr. F. said that he did not know how his colleagues would vote till the question should be taken. He had never consulted them, nor the members of any other State on the subject, nor communicated his opinions to but a few of his colleagues in private, before the question came on. If the members from the State he represented had held a meeting on the subject, they had not informed him, and he did not believe they had; but be that as it may, he would inform the gentleman that he was not sent there to vote on either his opinion or theirs, but on his own. That, in making up his mind, he could assure his colleague that he never had taken greater pains and care to free it from prejudices on the subject, which he acknowledged had been strong, and to examine it in all its aspects by the rules of equity, expediency, and national faith; and that he had decidedly made up his mind. He hoped his colleagues had done so too. It was a subject on which good men might differ in opinion. He had not in any manner denounced his colleague for voting as he had said he would do, and he did not know what authority he had to notice him in the manner he had done. If we were obliged by the Constitution to be unanimous, it indeed suggested an idea of economy he had not thought of before. The State of Pennsylvania by sending one member to give the votes of eighteen, would produce a considerable saving to the United States, and he supposed his colleague would do very well to give the vote for the whole. Some other respectable gentleman, he said, had honored him with particular attention, but in such a manner as he had too much respect for the character of this House and his own character, to follow with any remarks.

Mr. F. said he would not, at this late hour, detain the House with any observations on the laws of Georgia of 1795 and 1796, but would offer a few remarks on the title of Georgia to the land in question, as it respected these claims. A gentleman from Virginia, yesterday, (Mr. HOLMES,) had read Vattel on the Law of Nations to prove that some of the Kings in Europe could not alienate the royal domains. He begged leave to observe that this maxim did not apply to this country, which had a common law peculiar to its circumstances. Many of them had vacant land, but this land was not considered so much as part of the sovereignty, as a source of revenue arising from its sale; and the power of disposing of it was vested in, and exercised by, the respective Legislatures; and the constitution of Georgia, in this respect, was similar to that of the other States. None of them had royal domains. Congress had repeatedly acknowledged this right in the Legislature of the State of Georgia, by soliciting a cession of land to be made by it to the United States, and finally by accepting a cession from it, on specified conditions. But being in undisturbed possession, was, agreeably to the practice of this country, sufficient to protect her grants. He believed most of the Union had made compromises of territory, and transfers, even of inhabitants, from one to the other, on the principles of compromise. The State of Pennsylvania has done so with all the neighboring States. The property of the islands of the river Delaware was settled by compromise with the State of New Jersey. The boundary between Pennsylvania and Maryland had been long contested, and was finally settled by compromise in such a manner as that Maryland rights for land in Pennsylvania, and Pennsylvania rights in Maryland were both protected. But the accommodation which applies more fully to the present case, was made with Virginia. On the conclusion of the Indian war which broke out in 1763, a settlement was formed at Redstone Creek, perhaps fifty miles or more within the chartered bounds of Pennsylvania, and the settlers claimed to hold under Virginia. It was forbid by the law of Pennsylvania to settle that country, and the Governor sent as Commissioners General Potter, Col. Allison, and Rev. Mr. Steel, to the place, to inform them of the title of Pennsylvania and to forbid the settling the land, it not then being purchased from the natives. The respectability of the Commissioners was supposed to give weight to the object. They informed the settlers that the land belonged to Pennsylvania, and warned them of the danger of persisting in an unlawful claim. This solemn and candid notice had not the desired effect; citizens from other colonies, and even from Pennsylvania, flocked to that part of the territory, professing to hold under the State of Virginia. At this time, the government of Virginia had given no official titles to the land, but it was well known that the price of land in Virginia was much lower than in Pennsylvania. No such claim was ever made by the United States to any of the territory of Georgia, nor such warning given against purchasing or settling the land.

In a short time after this, however, Lord Dunmore, the last Royal Governor of Virginia, opened a land office in that country, and issued land warrants at one-tenth of the Pennsylvania price, and less than one-twelfth of the fees; and at least three counties were organized by Virginia, within the chartered bounds of Pennsylvania, in which only one county court was organized by Pennsylvania, and the justices of that court were arrested while sitting on the bench, at a place near one hundred miles within the chartered limits of that State, and above seventy miles from the limits afterwards made by compromise. The Revolutionary war commenced, and the settlers under the authority of both States, made temporary compromises, by which the country was protected against invasion and property secured.

Though there had been contentions between the settlers, there had been harmony between the States; and after various attempts which had failed, before the war with Britain ceased, the two States made a compromise. Pennsylvania gave up to Virginia half a degree of her chartered claim, and Virginia gave up to Pennsylvania three organized counties, with their inhabitants. Let it not, however, be said that the actual settlers alone were secured in their pre-emption right, as was usual in Pennsylvania. This was not the case. Those who proved that they held under Virginia, procured patents from Pennsylvania at less than one-tenth of the price which those who held under Pennsylvania had to pay, and those who claimed unseated land under Virginia grants held their claim. That fine body of land called Washington's Bottom, in Fayette county, above forty miles within the present limits of Pennsylvania, has been sold without contest; and about the year 1786, General WASHINGTON, in the character of guardian, recovered seven or eight plantations by the decision of the State court of Washington county, in Pennsylvania, on which so many families had made large improvements, without suspicion of a prior claim, and there is now a claim of the same kind before the supreme court of Pennsylvania, brought by Craughan's heirs, to a much larger amount. There was a larger amount of land contested between Virginia and Pennsylvania than that which is reserved in the convention with Georgia and the United States to satisfy claims. The claims under Virginia had extended into what is now five extensive counties of Pennsylvania. Adding to this half a degree of latitude of the chartered claim of Pennsylvania, for about ninety miles of length, ceded to Virginia, amounts to much more than the residue of the five millions of acres, which is the greatest amount in question. All this was amicably settled by compromise, and the sister States continued in harmony and the country was settled with respectable citizens. The case, he said, which he had mentioned the other day of the claims of the settlers at Wyoming, had been supposed to teach an opposite doctrine; but the members who were acquainted with the circumstances would acknowledge it did not. They must acknowledge that the most southern boundary of that State, bordering on Maryland and Virginia, was settled to the utmost western boundary; that the northern boundary, which included the Connecticut settlement, was not settled to half that extent, or at most, very dispersedly settled; that at least ten or twelve counties on that side of the State, laid out by law, could not be organized for want of people, and that all the other side of the State east of the Ohio was thickly settled and organized long ago, and that several counties west of the Ohio are so far settled as to be organized on the southwestern boundary; such were the different effects of a compromise and a continued contest.

Mr. F. said he had reason to beg pardon of the House for calling their attention to so tedious a narrative, and which they might suppose had little relation to the question; but it was his opinion that if the report of the committee and the treaty or convention with Georgia was not carried into effect, though he might not live to see it, the examples he had stated would be found to have a bearing on the subject; but on this view of it he could not enlarge, and he hoped his apprehensions would not be realized. But he was astonished to observe his friends, who on this subject took the other side of the question, depart so widely in their arguments from the question before the House. He said that the laws of Georgia passed in 1789, 1795, and 1796, were certainly not now before the House. The law of Georgia passed in 1789, and the still more extensive, and, he believed, from good information, the most corrupt sale of 1795, were all set aside, and they were not then called on to decide on a territory as extensive as any kingdom in Europe, as the gentleman just sat down (Mr. SLOAN, from New Jersey) had alleged. These monstrous speculations had vanished, as many others had done; the whole square miles it would contain was but little more than was not long since contained in one county through which he had to pass going home, but which is now divided into more counties. He said he disapproved of monopolies, but still more of rendering all property insecure. He disapproved of such speculations.

Mr. F. said, though he had had the best opportunities, he had taken no share in those or any other speculations, yet while there is so much land in the United States at market, he had found they were not attended with all the evils which he had anticipated; they paid high county and road taxes, which they would not have done if they had not been owned by individuals, and no profit could be obtained from them but by sale to actual settlers, which could now be done, on easy terms, and in small instalments. The foreign companies, who held much larger bodies of land in Pennsylvania than any other, were much more mischievous. The poor actual settlers were then dragged 400 miles to the Federal courts in Philadelphia, and from thence to this city, to have their claims decided; and even if they gained the action, they had to part with their plantations to pay their own expenses and the attorneys' fees; this, though a great evil, he believed was an incidental one. That clause of the Constitution of the United States which had been construed to favor this practice, he believed was never intended to bring municipal cases before the Federal courts, and the construction which it had obtained in practice, he had no doubt would soon be remedied. He acknowledged he might be thought to have wandered from the subject, but he supposed he would obtain an easy excuse from gentlemen on the other side, some of whom, in their arguments, had scarcely ever touched the point in question.

This observation might seem harsh, but if time would permit, it could easily be substantiated. The candor of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. NELSON,) who was up this morning, he said, he was sure would induce him to acknowledge that, instead of arguing against the obligation of the convention between the United States and Georgia and the law of the United States, whereby we are obliged to apply the deposit of the residue of five millions of acres, or part thereof, to satisfy these claims, or to return the land to the State of Georgia; he had taken other ground, he had collected into one mass all the corruption of the Legislature of Georgia yet unpunished by the Judiciary of their own State, and all the corrupt influence of the original purchasers from that Legislature, and this gentleman, with others on that side of the question, had heaped all the guilt of this speculation and of all the speculations, if not since the world began, at least from the commencement of the Revolution, on the heads of innocent and honest purchasers, against whom, though there was above 1,200 of them, no charge of fraud was brought, and whose characters had been asserted not only to be unimpeachable, but very respectable both in a moral and political point of view, by members whose testimony was entitled to the highest respect; yet the contrary had not only been presumed but argued from as an established fact. He acknowledged, however, that the gentleman just sat down (Mr. SLOAN) had admitted this position was not supported by any kind of testimony, but had told the House that he had found or created a clue out of his own imagination to trace their guilt, and to convince him that the people at 1,100 miles distance acted in concert with the corrupt Legislature of Georgia in preparing a snare for themselves and their friends, but the gentleman had not informed the House how to trace his imaginary clue; visionary clues had been mentioned for other purposes formerly in Congress, but never traced nor realized.

Mr. F. said, that it had been his lot to have been in public bodies of different kinds, in the State government, and also in the Congress of the United States, where party spirit and irritation had run very high—where sometimes one party preponderated and sometimes another, and where parties were nearly equal. But on no question before the present had he heard corrupt motives ascribed to members who differed in opinion; at no time had he heard members called on to rescue their characters from the infamy of corruption; at no time had he heard the trumpet of party spirit sounded on the floor of a public body to influence a decision of a claim of property; at no time had he heard the opinions or power of another branch of the Government brought in as a substitute for argument; at no time had he heard the characters of individual members arraigned, instead of replying to their arguments, before the present occasion.

During all his opportunity of observation, Mr. F. said, party spirit was always exerted about the construction of the Constitution, or about the measures of Government, and even in such cases it was never permitted to be mentioned in argument with impunity; but the mention of party in the decision on claims of property would have been considered as a breach of the rules of order and decency by all parties. In times when party spirit rose to an alarming height, he never, even out of doors, heard of any decision on a claim of property ascribed to the influence of party. However far one party might charge the other with political error, and oppose the political measures they pursued, he never had heard the morals or the motives of members attacked on the floor of the House, but had always observed the most remote attempt of that kind suppressed by the authority of the House.

Mr. F. acknowledged he had been astonished at the manner in which the arguments in opposition to the report of the Committee of Claims, in favor of carrying into complete execution the convention with the State of Georgia, had been conducted. These arguments had been uniformly applied to cases that had no connexion with the question before the House. Whether the Assembly of Georgia, in 1789, had made a good bargain or a bad one, or whether the succeeding Assembly, in defeating that contract, had acted on honorable or dishonorable principles; or whether the Assembly of 1795, in their law for the sale, had acted so corruptly as to vitiate the contracts made under that law, though all the other laws made by that same Assembly were sustained; or whether the ex post facto act of the Assembly of 1796, impairing the obligation of contracts contrary to the Constitution of the United States, was sufficiently justified by necessity, and could annul the former contracts for a valuable consideration, were questions that had never been decided by a court of justice, nor had Congress any negative or revisionary powers over the laws of Georgia.

Mr. F. said that the whole question before the House arose from the book in his hand (the President's Message.) In pursuance of a resolution of Congress, for that purpose, the President had instructed three commissioners appointed by law, to treat with the State of Georgia for a cession of the territory, or part of it, then possessed by the Indians. The State of Georgia had also appointed three commissioners on their part to meet with the commissioners fully authorized by the United States. A convention or treaty of cession was made to the United States of fifty-two millions of acres of land, subject to specified conditions; five millions of acres of which was appropriated to satisfy specific claims; and the residue, after compensating those claims, was appropriated to satisfy, quiet, and compensate other claims obtained under any law, or pretended law of Georgia, and if not so appropriated within one year, the lands will revert to the State of Georgia.

A law was passed in 1803, to carry the convention of Georgia into execution, in which the residue of the five millions of acres, after the specific claims were satisfied, are expressly appropriated to satisfy, quiet, and compensate the claims in question, and the claimants have been, by Government, invited to release their original claim to thirty-five million of acres, and to make proposals of compromise, and, in the meantime, to register their claims in the office of the Secretary of State. At considerable expense they have made proposals of compromise, and registered their claims, and proposals have been made by the authority of Government to them; and these mutual proposals of compromise have been laid before the Congress by the President, in order that commissioners may be authorized to settle and adjust the claims, and satisfy, quiet, and compensate them, on equitable principles. These, he said, were the facts on record, and from these facts he considered the Government to be under a moral obligation to apply the residue of the five millions of acres, amounting probably to little, if any, more than four millions of acres, and, as a member of the House, he was convinced that he was under a moral obligation to vote for it. He repeated that, agreeably to the opinions of the commissioners, though neither the United States nor the State of Georgia were suable in law, and the claimants had no direct legal remedy, yet that the interest of the United States, the tranquillity of those who may hereafter inhabit the territory, and various equitable considerations, rendered a compromise expedient; a full indemnity is not proposed nor sought.

Some, however, in opposition, had asked, how could this interest of the United States be promoted by it? He would, also, ask if it was not the interest of the United States to fulfil her engagements with good faith? She having never purchased or paid for the land in question, but received it as a deposit to be applied to the relief of those injured claimants, or to be returned to the State of Georgia, whose Legislature had done the injury. The State of Georgia made the deposit for the purpose of making some reparation for the injury, and lest the United States should apply it to her use, had exacted the obligation of returning of it if it was not so applied. He confessed, when he first saw the conditions of the act of cession, he thought this provision expressed an unreasonable jealousy of the United States. But when he heard gentlemen, when argument failed, declaim that, if we applied the residue of the five millions of acres for the purposes for which it was deposited with Government, and appropriated by both the mutual act of cession and the subsequent law of Congress, that we were putting our hands into the public purse, robbing the public of millions of dollars, &c., he was astonished.

He said he would ask these gentlemen if they were convinced, on dispassionate examination, that, laying hold on this deposit for the use of the United States, would be for their interest? He was persuaded it would not. The commissioners report that there is above three millions of acres adjoining the Mississippi freed from the Indian claim, and these settlements had been made long since, and the land office of the United States has been open for some time; yet we all know that, notwithstanding the great advantages of the situation, the lands sell and the country settles very slowly indeed. Compare this with the State of Tennessee, which has now three members in this House, and very lately was not known as a State. Compare it with the State of Ohio, which lately was an Indian hunting ground and seat of war, and much more remote from market, and yet this wilderness is now grown to a populous State. He asked why the lands on the Mississippi, with such superior advantages, did not sell, and the population increase in some proportion to other new settlements? The reason to him was plain. Where the title was clear, where there was no danger of future disputes, good people would emigrate and settle their families; where it was not so, no wise man would run the risk of vesting his property, and leaving his family under a cloud of uncertainty.

The United States have purchased fifty-two millions of acres from Georgia, for which they are to make the payments out of the proceeds of the sales, besides the reserve of five millions of acres to satisfy claims against that State. Out of this, in the first place, specific claims of actual settlers, and some others, are to be satisfied, to perhaps more than one million of acres. Georgia sold lands to an amount unknown, in 1789, to the Virginia and Carolina companies, for which part payment was received, and in 1795, that State sold what the commissioners estimated at thirty-five millions of acres, for which payment was fully made, and patents granted in due form, and, by the original patentees, sold to others. None of these sales have ever been set aside by a court and jury, without whose decision no man, under either the Government of the United States or the individual States, can be legally divested of his property. These facts are very generally known, and every man of common information knows, that though the claimants cannot have an action against the State of Georgia or the United States, yet they can have an action against any or all the actual settlers on the land which they claim. This apprehension, if it was worse founded than it is, would be sufficient to prevent the sale and settlement of the land until these claims are settled by compromise, agreeably to the convention with Georgia, and the usual practice of the other States, and the original claim relinquished. Experience and observation had taught him, he said, that the sooner accommodations of this kind were made, they were the easier and the cheaper done. He added, that quieting and satisfying twelve hundred respectable and injured claimants and their connexions, who had been injured by their confidence in the law of a State, and in men who stood high in Government, was certainly the interest and duty of Congress, when it could be done without loss, which it certainly could in this case, for the land in question had cost the United States nothing, but was a deposit from Georgia for that very purpose.

Mr. F. said, that if by the compromise the claimants obtained and accepted of the ninth or tenth part of the land which they had purchased and paid for, they could gain nothing by it except by actual settlement; that compact settlements and improvements made in consequence of the compromise would increase the value and encourage the settlement of the land adjoining, and remove the cloud of doubt that would hang over the sale of these lands, and would also strengthen and enrich the United States in the quarter in which it was weakest and most vulnerable. These considerations had induced him to believe that rejecting the amendment moved, by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. CLARK,) and agreeing with the report of the committee was for the interest of the United States, even if they were under no obligation of law or justice. He said he could assure the House that he had possessed as strong prepossessions against the speculations of Georgia as he thought any man could do; that he had examined every avenue of information respecting the case, and sought to find every argument against the claim that his judgment and conscience would admit, before he had to sit on the solemn and awful seat of judgment, before he was called to decide on the case, a case wherein the faith, the honor, and the future peace of the United States; and the fortunes of individuals, were deeply interested, but he undoubtedly had endeavored to divest himself of every prejudice, of every prepossession. To gentlemen who had used the unprecedented freedom of attacking his motives instead of his arguments and of implicating his virtue, he had a right to put the question: Had they divested themselves, of all prepossession? Were they influenced by no prejudice? But passing this, those attacks, without example in any public body, and not justified by any rule of order, had occasioned other members to make declarations of their own character, which nothing but the singularity of the attacks could justify. He thought he was also justified in declaring that he had not now, nor never had any interest in the Georgia or any other speculations, nor had he any friend or relation, to his knowledge, that had; and none of the owners or agents of the companies, or their friends, had attempted to influence his mind on the subject. In making this unusual declaration, he was certain he would be believed by those who knew him best; they knew that he never had even a lawsuit about land in court in his life.

Mr. F. said that, if he had not taken so much pains to understand the subject as he did, the arguments in opposition to the report of the committee and the manner in which the opposition had been conducted, would have given his mind a bias in favor of the report. During all his time of observation, and he had not been an inattentive observer, he always found a good cause best supported by arguments that had a close analogy to the subject, and candid address to the judgment, without inflaming the passions. He long had been in the habit, when he came into a court of justice, of judging of the goodness of the cause by the manner of the arguments; whenever he heard a good attorney use sophistry, or arguments that had no real bearing on the subject, or have recourse to animated declamation, he believed the cause was bad, and in this he had seldom been mistaken.

He asked, why was all this heat and uncommon zeal? The gentlemen knew well that no public property was at stake, nor any political principle proposed to be perverted. They knew well that no fraud was proposed to be countenanced. If the Assemblies of Georgia of 1789 and of 1795 were corrupt, and committed frauds on people at a distance, and sold lands to the amount of forty or fifty millions of acres, that monstrous and fraudulent sale would be corrected. The corrupt legislators indeed would not, nor had not been punished; but the innocent purchasers would—they would not at most get the residue of five millions of acres after satisfying numerous claims? How can gentlemen say that we propose to reward frauds, when we propose only to authorize the President to appoint, no doubt, the three best men that the United States can afford, to distribute, not an empire, but the residue of the five millions of acres, or part thereof, among the innocent and injured purchasers, who have, agreeably to the law for that purpose provided, made their proposals and registered their claims? Do we doubt the President's discernment and integrity in the choice, or the ability and honesty of the Commissioners he will choose? For his own part, Mr. F. said, he had no doubt of either; and when he opposed the fulfilling the moral and political obligations of the Government with good faith, he would disclaim the name and character of a republican.

Mr. J. CLAY requested his friend, Mr. CLARK, to withdraw his amendment, that the House might meet the question at once.

Mr. CLARK thereupon withdrew the amendment.

Mr. VARNUM begged permission to set the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NELSON) right. The Committee of Claims had reported a bill, making provision for those who were disabled by known wounds received in the service of the United States during the Revolutionary war, which bill had been twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NELSON.—It is true, sir, there is such a bill upon your table; but where is the gentleman on this floor that will say the bill will pass? besides, it contains so many clauses, such restrictions and modifications, that I really do not know the man who will be bettered a single cent by it. I am not throwing any imputation upon the Committee of Claims; they, no doubt, do their duty; I am simply speaking of the liberty of Congress, and comparing a Yazoo land speculator with an old soldier. The one asks you for an annuity of forty dollars to make him comfortable in his old age; the other, in all the bustle and gayety of life, modestly requests a sop in the pan; give me ten millions of dollars, and that will stay my stomach until dinner is ready; I will call upon you next year. We are about giving five millions of acres of land to stock-jobbers, speculators, and gamblers; this they claim of the liberality of Congress. It is an old saying and a true one, that a man ought to be just before he is generous. We have on our table a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating that there are liquidated claims, justly due from the United States to individuals, to the amount of $290,000; those persons are as undoubtedly entitled to the payment of their just debts, as Yazoo men are to our donations. But, say gentlemen, this is a proper subject for you to exercise your liberality on. I have no idea of that species of liberality, which takes from the body of the community their pence in order to give it away by pounds to individuals. There was a celebrated highwayman in England, of whom it was said, he robbed the rich to give to the poor; I do not know but his morality was better than ours, for we are about to rob the poor to give to the rich. If we must be generous, for Heaven's sake, let us search for more worthy objects; let us look for the war-worn soldier; for a numerous family in distress, and then I will say, be liberal: but no, you will not do that. Recollect, however, that the blessings of the widow and the orphan will be more acceptable to the Deity than altars smoking with the blood of hecatombs.

I am sorry to detain the House so long. I will just briefly recapitulate the reasons, why I do not consider a compromise of this claim to be consistent with good policy. It is not politic to do that which is unlawful or unjust; the act of the corrupt Legislature of Georgia, of 1795, never had any validity; it was void ab initio; the faith of the people of Georgia was never pledged; it could not be pledged; for the Legislature had no authority on the subject. If, then, there never was a title granted by the Legislature, these innocent purchasers could not obtain it; they had also notice of the fraud, and cannot therefore be deemed innocent purchasers. If they had a title, then Congress are about to do them injustice, by granting them five instead of fifty millions of acres; and lastly, on the score of liberality, they have no claim, for it is not liberal to take from the pockets of our constituents money to increase the hoards of speculators. We are appointed guardians of the public purse, and it is our duty to prevent a public robbery.

Mr. VARNUM.—I do not mean to impeach the motives of any gentleman, but wish to assign reasons why I shall vote in favor of the resolutions reported by the Committee of Claims. They are reasons which may exonerate me in the opinion of those gentlemen who differ from me on the present question ; and they will be satisfied, when they are convinced their own motives are pure ; that mine are the same, although we differ in the views which we take of the subject.

Here Mr. V. recited, in chronological order, all the transactions which had taken place since the commencement of our Revolutionary war in relation to the back lands of the State of Georgia, from which he inferred that the Yazoo act of 1795 was as justifiable as any grant ever made by that State, and that the consideration was equal, if not superior, to any which she had previously obtained.

With respect to the present claimants, he did not conceive they had notice of fraud ; that never appeared to him to be the object of the communication of the President of the United States to Congress, in February, 1795. He said, he would give his reasons why he thought that was not the object of the communication. We had recently been engaged in a very extensive Indian war, the flames of which were scarcely smothered, and the exposed situation of the western part of Georgia was such as to render it at times extremely desirable that Georgia should make a cession thereof to the United States. It would be seen, from a perusal of the Message, that the President (WASHINGTON) deprecated a continuance of that war ; there is not a word in that Message that points to the purchase of the territory by individuals.

[Here Mr. V. read the Message, and everything connected therewith.]

At length Congress finally succeeded in obtaining this land by the cession of Georgia ; and if Georgia had no right to dispose of her vacant territory to individuals ; neither had she the right to dispose of it to the Union. So well convinced was Georgia of some lien being held upon the property by these and other purchasers, that she made a reservation of five millions of acres to be distributed among the claimants, under the sound discretion of Congress. Mr. V. said, he did not believe the United States entitled to any part of that five millions of acres, while there were any of the claimants of lands under the Government of Georgia left uncompensated. Hence, he did not conceive the position which had been taken a fair one ; that we are about to put our hands into the public purse to reward a gang of speculators ; or that we are about to rob the poor to give to the rich. He considered Congress as holding these five millions of acres merely in trust for those whom they may find fairly entitled to it. He concurred most heartily in the opinion which had been given by the Commissioners, that "sound policy requires a compromise." He had no concern, no interest in the decision of the question. He mentioned this in order to show gentlemen that his motives were as pure as their own, although their votes might differ.

Mr. STANTON.—Mr. Speaker, I had concluded to have satisfied myself by giving a silent vote on the amendment offered by a gentleman from Virginia, to the report of the Committee of Claims, relative to the Georgia lands. But as an attempt was made yesterday by an honorable gentleman of the committee from the State of Kentucky, with a view to criminate the conduct of the majority of the committee, and in his superabundant goodness, to implicate me in a particular manner, by innuendoes, that a republican member of the committee had gone over to the federal side, it becomes necessary for me to reply. Were that the fact, I shall always take a pride in so doing whenever they happen to be in the right. But the gentleman is incorrect in his statement ; the fact is, I never had but one opinion on the subject, sir, when your committee met upon the stupendous speculation which has involved so many serious consequences to the safety and honor of the nation, and such intemperate discussion ; that has wounded the feelings and censured the motives of venerable statesmen, whose talents, patriotism, and uniformity of conduct, in support of the rules of morality and sound policy, have never been doubted before. Mr. Speaker, when the committee met they heard the claimants, and those gentlemen from Georgia who opposed the claims with great ability. Your committee then entered into an investigation of the subject. The two honorable gentlemen from Virginia and North Carolina opposed the claims of the petitioners with cogency, to show that the claimants had no right in law or equity, and that it was both imprudent and impolitic for Government to interfere. The honorable gentleman from Kentucky seemed disposed to decline argument, although very able. I endeavored to provoke him to it, but to no purpose. Sir, the honorable member from Virginia who introduced the amendment, advanced a doctrine dangerous to the peace and welfare of the community, in my opinion. That a subsequent Legislature, or Convention, possesses a legitimate right of rendering null and void the doings of an antecedent one of equal constitutional power. Sir, if this pernicious doctrine prevails, I ask where are your boasted liberties, or that security of our persons and property so essentially necessary to our happiness ? Gone forever ! If this abhorrent doctrine should be sanctioned by Congress, our laws, however just and necessary, passed at the present session, may not only be repealed, but their retrospective operation rendered a nullity. Sir, the idolatrous tenet of our Judiciary, who assume the right not only of expounding and declaring the law, but also of pronouncing what laws are Constitutional, and what are unconstitutional—Mr. Speaker, all the imported diamonds of the East cannot out-blaze the crimson that ought to stain our cheeks, if we admit such dangerous maxims. Experience has taught us the bad effects of our Judiciary system ; the tenure by which they hold their offices is such, that they consider themselves too often independent of heaven and earth ; it puts the lives of our fellow-citizens at hazard. The honorable member from Maryland, whose lungs are quite equal to his talents, though both eminent, told the House he would not speak to their passions, but to their understandings. In the latter attempt he has failed. He then relapsed into censure ; paraphrased on the corruption of the Legislature of Georgia; that the claimants were speculators and swindlers, but without proving his assertions, he entertained the House with some funny anecdotes; told us we must be just before we are liberal. I confess he appeared animated, as though he considered himself addressing an ignorant jury, and was laboring to ram down their windpipe, like a fish, tail foremost, a fictitious evidence. The venerable gentleman from New Jersey, whose candor and sagacity on most occasions are conspicuous, rose, and after indulging himself in the order of the day; declamation and censure against speculators, and their fraudulent conduct, as dangerous to the peace of the community, he gravely read an extract from the best of books, an account of a red dragon, which would undoubtedly devour all those concerned in speculation. Sir, I could hardly suppose the gentleman serious, when I recollected he recently informed me of his intention to enter into the business himself. Sir, I hope he will not, lest the red dragon should devour him, as well as his brethren, the Yazoo claimants, and the nation lose his aid in her councils, and the State from which he came, a useful citizen. Sir, I have taken as correct a view of the whole ground on which the claims rest, as my humble abilities admit, and every inquiry and step I have taken, tend to confirm my early impressions, that sound policy dictates the measure, not merely because the Commissioners recommended it in their report made to Congress, and in whose talents and integrity, I place the utmost confidence, and Congress seems (by their various acts) to be disposed to satisfy equitable claims. If they shall appear unjust, they will be rejected. Sir, it is not for me at this late period of my life to quit the field because some of my political friends have apostatized from republicanism. I do not entertain a shadow of doubt of the correctness of the position I have taken; I shall persevere to the end, for such and such only will be saved. Sir, I am equally determined to disregard the frowns of tyrants, and the more despicable wheedlings of sycophants, under whatever garb they may appear. This is my political creed. This is my ultimatum. So help me God.

Mr. VAN CORTLANDT called for the reading of the resolution reported by the Committee of Claims, which being read, as follows:

Resolved, That three Commissioners be authorized to receive propositions of compromise and settlement, from the several companies or persons, having claims to public lands within the present limits of the Mississippi Territory, and, finally, to adjust and settle the same in such manner as in their opinion will conduce to the interest of the United States: Provided, That in such settlement the Commissioners shall not exceed the limits prescribed by the convention with the State of Georgia.

Mr. VAN CORTLANDT then moved to strike out the word "finally," and to add the following clause to the resolution: "And that the compromise shall not be considered binding on the United States, until confirmed by Congress;" in order that the decision might again come before Congress, that the doings of the Commissioners might not be binding on the United States until confirmed by another Congress.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—I hope the worthy gentleman from New York will, at my request, consent to withdraw his amendment. I ask it, because a resolution of a similar nature has been already referred to Commissioners appointed on the part of the United States, viz: the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General. They were authorized to receive offers of compromise from these very claimants, and report thereon to the House. They have done it. Do we expect to get Commissioners more able; men of greater talents; of more sagacity; more tried fidelity, or more impartiality than they were? Can you expect to receive propositions of compromise more beneficial than those which have been already received? The course which the worthy gentleman has pointed out, has been already travelled; those Commissioners have exercised that very authority which his proposition goes to vest in a new board; they have recommended a course for us to pursue; they have told you that there was fraud in the original contract; that it was void ab initio; they have told you no title can be derived under it; yet they recommend a settlement. They have, however, stated no reasons in support of their recommendation. When I first read their report, I was filled with unutterable astonishment—finding men in whom I had, and still have, the highest confidence, recommend a measure, which all the facts and all the reasons which they had collected, opposed and unequivocally condemned. I feel myself wandering back into the field of the main question. I meant to confine myself simply to oppose the alteration just proposed. I may, however, be permitted to say, that it has been, if not a well fought field, at least, if they prove victorious, to them a dear bought victory.

Mr. VAN CORTLANDT made an offer so to modify his motion as to confine it to striking out the word "finally."

Mr. J. RANDOLPH spoke against retaining even that part.

Mr. HUGER said he was in favor of the motion for striking out, in order that Congress might make the final decision, as he conceived that they were more competent than any three men, be they who they may. He had, on a former occasion, voted for the examination by the Commissioners, but he never gave his vote that they should finally decide. Congress, on this occasion, should be the alpha and omega.

He was now convinced, from what he had seen, that it would be absolutely necessary for the General Government to compromise the matter, and he thought that it could by no means be done so well as by Congress itself. At the last session he had voted for a similar amendment, and he was anxious that it should obtain at this time. The next Congress would be called upon by the people, to whom we have made an appeal. If they decide against this claim by sending Representatives to this House who are opposed to it, let their fiat be the law.

Georgia Claims.

H. OF R.

Mr. VAN CORTLANDT hereupon withdrew his motion for amending the resolution, which was revived by Mr. HUGER, and seconded by Mr. HOLLAND.

Mr. JACKSON said he was opposed to the amendment. He would prefer joining with the gentlemen who were in opposition to the measure rather than see this amendment carried. He was fully convinced that the House of Representatives was totally incompetent to decide upon fifteen hundred claims, which assumed as many different shapes. It would occupy the sessions of two years, and at last would probably be decided with less equity than it would be by Commissioners. He hoped gentlemen would not give their sanction to the amendment, and he hoped the decision would be taken on the general question, and that it would be final. He had no doubt but that Commissioners would be found equal to the task, and that they would not be deterred from doing justice by any circumstances which had taken place either within or without these doors.

Mr. HUGER requested the yeas and nays might be taken on the question for striking out the word "finally," but not being supported by the Constitutional number of members, the question was put on the amendment, and six members only rose in favor of it.

The yeas and nays were then taken on the resolution of the Committee of Claims, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 63, nays 58, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, jun, Simeon Baldwin, Isaac Betton, Phaniel Bishop, Adam Boyd, John Boyle, John Campbell, William Chamberlin, Martin Chittenden, Clifton Claggett, Jacob Crowninshield, Manasseh Cutler, Richard Cutts, Samuel W. The resolution was of consequence agreed to.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—On this question I have nothing more to say than to congratulate my friends on the vote just taken. We are strong in the cause of truth, and gentlemen will find that truth will ultimately prevail. When I compare the votes of this session with some of the votes of the last, my objections to refer this subject are almost done away. In whatever shape the subject may be again brought before the House, it will be my duty, and that of my friends, to manifest the same firm spirit of resistance, and to suffer no opportunity to pass of defeating a measure so fraught with mischief.

Mr. DANA moved to refer the resolution to the Committee of Claims to report a bill.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH opposed the motion.

On a division of the House, Mr. DANA's motion was carried, when the House adjourned.

[On a subsequent day, a bill was introduced for compromising the claims; but it was not acted upon by the House during the remainder of the session.]

MONDAY, February 4.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report in relation to sundry claims to land for military services rendered in the late Revolutionary war, in pursuance of the act of the nineteenth of March last, entitled "An act granting further time for locating military land warrants, and for other purposes," which were read, and referred to Mr. SOUTHARD, Mr. GREGG, Mr. HASTINGS, Mr. TRIGG, and Mr. LOWNDES, to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Resolved, That, during the trial of the impeachment now depending before the Senate, this House will attend, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, and proceed on the legislative business before the House, until the hour at which the Senate shall appoint, each day, to proceed on the trial of the impeachment now pending before that body, and that the House then resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, and attend the said trial.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the committee to whom were referred, on the twenty-eighth ultimo, the petition of the members of the Presbyterian Congregation in Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, reported a bill to incorporate the Trustees of the Presbyterian Congregation of Georgetown, and for other purposes; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster General, accompanying a report relative to post roads within the United States, which have not produced one-third part of the expense of carrying the mail upon the said roads during the last year; which were read, and referred to the committee appointed, on the sixth of November last "to inquire whether any, and what, amendments are necessary to be made in the acts to establish a post office and post roads within the United States."

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate is ready to proceed upon the impeachment of Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court, in the Senate Chamber; which Chamber is prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

The House, then, in pursuance of a resolution agreed to this day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and proceeded in that capacity to the Senate Chamber, to attend the trial, by the Senate, of the impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the committee returned into the Chamber of the House, and Mr. SPEAKER having resumed the Chair, Mr. VARNUM, from the said Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had, attended the trial by the Senate of the said impeachment, and that some progress had been made therein.

POTOMAC RIVER.

Mr. J. CLAY, from the committee to whom were referred, on the seventeenth of December last, the memorials and petitions of sundry citizens and inhabitants of the District of Columbia, in favor of, and in opposition to; "the building of a bridge across the Potomac river, from the extremity of Maryland Avenue, in the city of Washington, to Alexander's Island, in the said river," made the following report:

That doubts had formerly been entertained by some of the members of your committee of the right of Congress to legislate on the subject referred to their consideration; but inasmuch as an exercise of power, as long as that exercise is uncontroverted, may perhaps be considered as deciding the question of right, your committee are of opinion that a late law renders an investigation of the legitimate powers of Congress in the case unnecessary. The only inquiry is, what would be the advantages or disadvantages attending the erection of a bridge over the Potomac?

It appears to your committee that by the proposed bridge a saving of several miles of distance over a very bad road between the seat of Government and the town of Alexandria would be made; that consequently the southern mail would be transmitted to and from the city of Washington with greater expedition and security than at present; the communication between Alexandria and the northern cities would be rendered more easy and safe, and the general interests of the commerce of the United States, as far as respects the transmission of mercantile information between the northern and southern sections of the Union, would be much promoted. The commerce of Georgetown, it is alleged, will be materially injured by any obstruction which may be caused in the navigation of the river Potomac, and that the erection of a bridge would be an obstruction of such a nature as almost to destroy that commerce. That the inhabitants of that town, having generally settled there with views connected with the exercise of a mercantile profession those views would be counteracted, and their property considerably diminished in value. Your committee have little doubt but that the delay in ascending and descending the river produced by the erection of the contemplated bridge would, in some measure, affect the trade of Georgetown; but that trade is so small that it could scarcely have any great operation on the value of property, or on the prosperity of the town. Georgetown owes its present flourishing state to its vicinity to the city of Washington, and not to any commercial profit arising from the enterprise of its inhabitants. And although some small individual injury might be the effect of erecting a bridge, yet that injury would be far more than counterbalanced by the public benefits arising from the measure—your committee therefore recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners, that a company should be incorporated for the purpose of erecting a bridge over the river Potomac, is reasonable, and ought to be granted.

The report was referred to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

TUESDAY, February 5.

Ordered, That the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to extend jurisdiction, in certain cases, to the State and Territorial courts," be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to an 'Act to make provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds received in the actual service of the United States, during the Revolutionary war,'" was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. GREGG, from the committee to whom was committed, on the twenty-fifth ultimo, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act concerning the mode of surveying the public lands of the United States," reported the same, without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be read the third time to-morrow.

A Message was received from the President of the United States transmitting a note and documents from the Danish Chargé de Affairs claiming, in the name of his Government, restitution in the case of the brig Henrich. The said Message was read, and, together with the papers transmitted therewith, as, also, the report and other documents made and presented at the last session, in relation to the subject-matter of the claim for restitution of the said brigantine Henrich, referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom were referred, on the fifteenth of November last, the petitions of sundry inhabitants of the town of Westerly, in the State of Rhode Island, and of Stonington, in the State of Connecticut, reported a bill to provide for a light-house on Watch Hill Point, in the State of Rhode Island; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred, on the twenty-first ultimo, a memorial of Edward Toppan, and others therein named, of the town of Newburyport, in the State of Massachusetts; merchants, reported a bill for the relief of Edward Toppan, George Jenkins, and William Currier; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion, of Mr. CLARK, it was.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to lay before this House an abstract of all the evidences of title to lands claimed under any act or pretended act of the State of Georgia, passed or pretended to be passed, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine and one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, recorded in his office; noting the dates of the instruments, the names of the parties, the quantity of land, with the species of warranty, and any proviso or condition that may be annexed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to authorize the erection of a bridge across a mill pond and marsh in the navy yard belonging to the United States, in the town of Brooklyn, in the State of New York. The bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which were twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to continue in force "An act declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the State of Maryland, passed the twenty-eighth of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, for the appointment of a health officer." The bill was reported with an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The bill for extinguishing certain debts due by the United States was considered in Committee of the Whole.

After some time spent in considering the same, the Committee rose and reported the bill; but were refused leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. R. GRISWOLD the bill was referred to a select committee of five, to report. During this transaction Mr. EPES had read a new bill in his place, which went to make immediate provision for the debts still due to our Revolutionary soldiers, and invalid pensioners, which it was intended should go before the committee just appointed. The SPEAKER said the committee had full power to consider the same.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

Mr. DANA from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill providing for the settlement of sundry claims to lands within the Mississippi Territory.

The bill was read the first time.

Mr. J. CLAY moved that it be rejected.

After a short conversation, the question was taken by yeas and nays—yeas 52, nays 58, as follows:

The question was then taken on reading the bill a second time at this time, and carried, yeas 59.

It was then referred to a Committee of the Whole.

On the inquiry of the SPEAKER for what day it should be made the order.

Mr. DANA moved that it be made the order for to-morrow.

Mr. LEIB moved Monday week, in which motion he was supported by Messrs. J. CLAY, and CLARK.

The question was first put upon Monday week, and passed in the negative—yeas 53, nays 59.

This day week was then named, and disagreed to—yeas 55, nays 56.

PRESERVATION OF PEACE.

On the call of Mr. NICHOLSON, the bill for the more effectual preservation of peace in the ports and harbors of the United States, and in the waters under their jurisdiction, was taken up in Committee of the Whole; when, after a short debate, the following amendment, previously offered by Mr. NICHOLSON in lieu of the second section, and an amendment in lieu of the fifth section, were agreed to. The bill so amended was reported and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

First amendment in lieu of the second section.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That whensoever, after the passage of this act, any felony, misprision of felony, misdemeanor, or breach of peace, shall be committed within the body of a county in any one of the United States, and any process of law shall be issued under the authority of the State, for the purpose of arresting the offender, if the said offender shall be on board of any foreign armed vessel, in any port or harbor of the United States, and within the jurisdiction of the State, in which the offence was committed, it shall be lawful for the Governor, or other supreme executive officer of the State, in which the said offence shall have been committed, upon due proof thereof, and upon his being satisfied that the ordinary posse comitatus is insufficient to insure the execution of the said process, to issue the order, directed to any officer having command of regular troops, or armed vessel of the United States in the vicinity, requiring him to aid the officer charged with the execution of the process, with all the force under his command or such part thereof as may be necessary, in arresting the offender and all those giving him aid and countenance in resisting the civil authority. And if the said offender shall flee to any place beyond the jurisdiction of the State, and within the jurisdiction of the United States, the officer charged with the execution of the said process shall be and he is hereby authorized to pursue the said offender into such place, taking with him if necessary the said armed force and there arrest him, in virtue of the said process. And if the said offender shall flee to and be on board of any foreign armed vessel being in any place beyond the jurisdiction of the State, and within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, the officer charged with the execution of the said process shall first demand the delivery of the said offender, of and from the person or persons having charge and command of the said foreign armed vessel, declaring the authority and cause for which the demand is made; and if the said offender be not delivered according to the said demand, or if the officer charged with the execution of the process, be obstructed in attempting to make the demand, then he shall use all the means in his power by force and arms, to enter on board of the said foreign armed vessel, there to search for and arrest the said offender, and all those who are with him giving him aid and countenance, in preventing and resisting the execution of the said process, and the officer charged with the execution of the said process shall convey the said offender and deliver him over to the civil authority of the State, to be dealt with according to law; and all those arrested for being concerned in resisting the execution of the process shall be delivered over to the civil authority of the United States, and shall be punished in the same manner as if they had been concerned in knowingly and wilfully obstructing, resisting, or opposing any officer of the United States, in serving or attempting to serve any warrant or other legal or judicial writ issued under the authority of the United States. But if any of those concerned in making the arrest be killed in a place within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, those engaged in resisting the civil authority shall be punished as in case of felonious homicide; and if the person charged with the offence, or any of those concerned with him in resisting, be killed, in a place under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, it shall be justified.

Amendment in lieu of the fifth section:

SEC. 5 And be it further enacted, That whenever any officer of an armed vessel commissioned by any foreign Power, shall, on the high seas or elsewhere, commit any trespass on any citizen or vessel of the United States, or any spoliation of the property of any such citizen, or any vexation of trading vessels actually coming to or going from the United States, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on satisfactory proof of the facts, by proclamation, forever to interdict the entrance of the said officer, and of any armed vessel by him commanded, within the limits of the United States; and if at any time after such proclamation made he shall be found within the limits of the United States, he shall be liable therefor to be arrested, indicted, and punished by fine and imprisonment, in any court of the United States, having competent jurisdiction; and it shall be a part of the sentence that he shall within such time after the payment of his fine, and the expiration of his term of imprisonment, as the court shall direct, leave the United States, never to return. And if he shall return within the limits of the United States after the passing of such sentence, or be found therein, after the period limited by the court as aforesaid, he shall again be liable to be indicted, fined, and imprisoned, at the discretion of the court, Provided always, That if the said officer shall also have committed any other offence made punishable by this act, he shall be liable to prosecution and punishment, the provisions of this section to the contrary notwithstanding.

WEDNESDAY, February 6.

An engrossed bill for the more effectual preservation of peace in the ports and harbors of the United States, and in the waters under their jurisdiction, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to authorize the erection of a bridge across a mill-pond and marsh in the navy yard belonging to the United States, in the town of Brooklyn, in the State of New York, was read the third time; and, on a motion made and seconded, recommitted to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

An engrossed bill to continue in force "An act declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the State of Maryland, passed the twenty-eighth day of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, for the appointment of a health officer," was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate communicated to the House a copy of the answer of Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to the articles of impeachment exhibited to the Senate against him by this House.

The said copy of the answer was read, and ordered to be referred to the managers appointed, on the part of this House, to conduct the said impeachment.

On motion of Mr. LEIB, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill in addition to an act entitled an act to promote the progress of the useful arts, and to repeal an act heretofore enacted for that purpose.

Mr. LEIB moved to strike out the first section of the bill, in order to try the sense of the House on the principle upon which it was founded, viz., to make a general provision for the extension of patent rights under certain modifications to twenty-one years instead of fourteen years, which the existing laws provide for, and with a view to make special provision for the case of Oliver Evans, the great improver of machinery in mercantile mills, &c.

After some discussion, the first section was struck out, and the Committee rose and reported progress; and, on the question, Shall the Committee of the Whole have leave to sit again? the motion was lost.

It was then moved to refer the bill, together with the petition of Oliver Evans, to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, and on the question, the motion was lost. The question on engrossing was also lost; so the bill was rejected.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures of the twenty-eighth ultimo, to whom were referred, on the ninth and sixteenth of November last, the petitions and memorials of a number of merchants, traders, and farmers, on the waters of the Roanoke and Cashie rivers, in the district of Edenton, and State of North Carolina; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported to the House their disagreement to the same.

The House then proceeded to consider the said report; and the resolution contained therein, being twice read, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to make Plymouth, in North Carolina, a port of entry:

The question was taken that the House do concur with the Committee of the whole House, in their disagreement to the same, and resolved in the affirmative.

A motion was then made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to make Plymouth, in North Carolina, a port of entry:

Ordered, That a bill, or bills, be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures do prepare and bring in the same.

JUDGE CHASE.

MR. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the managers appointed to conduct the impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to whom was, this day, referred the copy of an answer of the said Samuel Chase, to the articles of impeachment exhibited to the Senate against him by this House, made a report; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was read, and is as follows:

"That they have considered the said answer, and do find that the said Samuel Chase has endeavored to cover the crimes and misdemeanors laid to his charge, by evasive insinuations, and misrepresentation of facts; and that the said answer does give a gloss and coloring, utterly false and untrue, to the various criminal matters contained in the said articles; and do submit to the judgment of the House, their opinion, that, for avoiding any imputation of delay to the House of Representatives, in a case of so great moment, a replication be, forthwith, sent to the Senate, maintaining the charge of this House; and that the Committee had prepared a replication accordingly, which they herewith report to the House, as follows:

"The House of Representatives of the United States have considered the answer of Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, to the articles of impeachment against him by them exhibited, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States; and observe,

"That the said Samuel Chase has endeavored to cover the high crimes and misdemeanors laid to his charge, by evasive insinuations, and misrepresentation of facts; that the answer does give a gloss and coloring, utterly false and untrue, to the various criminal matters contained in the said articles; that the said Samuel Chase did, in fact, commit the numerous acts of oppression, persecution, and injustice, of which he stands accused; and the House of Representatives, in full confidence of the truth and justice of their accusation, and of the necessity of bringing the said Samuel Chase to a speedy and exemplary punishment, and not doubting that the Senate will use all becoming diligence to do justice to the proceedings of the House of Representatives, and to vindicate the honor of the nation, do aver their charge against the said Samuel Chase to be true; and that the said Samuel Chase is guilty in such manner as he stands impeached; and that the House of Representatives will be ready to prove their charges against him, at such convenient time and place, as shall be appointed for that purpose."

On motion of Mr. J. RANDOLPH the House took the said replication into consideration.

MR. R. GRISWOLD moved to commit the same to a Committee of the whole House.

MR. ELLIOT supported, and Mr. J. RANDOLPH opposed the motion.

The question being put, the same was rejected.

MR. DENNIS moved to amend the replication by striking out therefrom after the words "and observe," the following words:

"That the said Samuel Chase has endeavored to cover the high crimes and misdemeanors laid to his charge, by evasive insinuations, and misrepresentation of facts; that the said answer does give a gloss and coloring, utterly false and untrue, to the various criminal matters, contained in the said articles."

The question was taken on this motion, by yeas and nays, and lost—yeas 41, nays 70, as follows:

THURSDAY, February 7.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a certificate of the Secretary, Comptroller, and Treasurer, of the State of New York, relative to the election of GEORGE CLINTON, jr., to serve as a member of this House for the said State, in the place of SAMUEL L. MITCHELL, appointed a Senator of the United States; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Elections.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act concerning the mode of surveying the public lands of the United States," was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LATTIMORE, from the committee to whom were referred, on the eighth and fourteenth of November last, the memorials and petitions of the Board of Trustees of Jefferson College, in the Mississippi Territory of the United States, and of William Dunbar, an inhabitant of the said Territory, presented to this House during the present and at the last session of Congress, made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on an engrossed bill to authorize the erection of a bridge across a mill pond and marsh, in the navy yard belonging to the United States, in the town of Brooklyn, in the State of New York, recommitted to the said Committee on the sixth instant. The bill was reported with an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

The bill, as amended, was then read the third time and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to appropriate a sum of money for the purpose of building gun-boats. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate will, this day, at two o'clock, meet in the Senate Chamber, and proceed on the trial of Samuel Chase.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom were committed on the twenty-third ultimo, the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for carrying into more complete effect the tenth article of the Treaty of Friendship, Limits, and Navigation, with Spain," made a report thereon; which was read, and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendments.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the Postmaster General to make a new contract for carrying the mail from Fayetteville, in North Carolina, to Charleston, in South Carolina," with amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. And that the Senate will, to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, proceed to the trial of Samuel Chase.

POST ROADS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on a motion of the seventh of December last, respecting "the establishment of a post road from Knoxville, in the State of Tennessee, to the settlement on the Tombigbee river, in the Mississippi Territory, and from thence to New Orleans; also, for the establishment of a post road from Georgia to the settlements on the Tombigbee, to intersect the former road at the most convenient point between Knoxville and the Tombigbee;" to which Committee of the whole House were also referred on the tenth of the said month of December, and on the first instant, the report of a select committee, and a Message from the President of the United States, on the same subject.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL observed, that having introduced this resolution, he would very briefly state some of the reasons that induced him to do so, and the grounds upon which he expected the committee to adopt it. He stated the object of the measure to be two-fold. 1st. To obtain a direct route for the transportation of the mail from Knoxville, and also from Georgia, to the Tombigbee settlements, and thence to New Orleans, in order to facilitate the communication with those places by means of the mail. And 2d. To open a communication from East Tennessee to the same places for commercial purposes. This measure, he said, was important to the citizens of East Tennessee, in both those points of view. The mail was conveyed at present, he observed, by a circuitous route, from Knoxville to Nashville, two hundred miles, thence to Natchez, at least five hundred miles, and thence to New Orleans, nearly three hundred miles; making in the whole, from Knoxville to New Orleans, one thousand miles. Whereas the distance from Knoxville to New Orleans by the route proposed to be opened, would not much, if any, exceed five hundred. A gentleman of undoubted veracity, who resided some years in the country through which this road will pass, in the service of the Government, estimates this route in the following manner: From Knoxville to Tellico, thirty-three miles. This part of the route passes through a settled country, and is at present a good road. From Tellico, to a place called the Hickory Ground, in the Creek Nation, near the junction of the Coosa river, with the Tallapoosa, where they form the Alabama, and about twenty miles from the Tuckabatchee settlements, two hundred and twenty miles. From thence to Fort St. Stephen's on the Tombigbee river, about one hundred miles; and thence to New Orleans, a direct course, about one hundred and fifty miles, making in all five hundred and three miles; and the largest calculations, as I had been informed, made by the Postmaster General, of this road from Knoxville to New Orleans, was five hundred and fifty miles; making very little more than half the present route. Add to this the distance from Washington to Knoxville, according to the estimated post route, five hundred and forty-seven miles, and the whole distance from Washington to New Orleans, passing by Knoxville—and from thence the proposed route will be about one thousand and fifty miles. This saving of between four and five hundred miles, in transporting the mail from Knoxville to New Orleans, is certainly a very important object to all those who may communicate with the latter place, by means of this route. This road is still more necessary, for the purpose of affording a communication from East Tennessee to the settlement on the Tombigbee, or the eastern parts of the Mississippi Territory. The only mode of communication at present with that country, is by the post road already stated, by Nashville to Natchez, seven hundred—and thence to the Tombigbee, about two hundred; making nine hundred miles. Whereas the real distance along the proposed route, as has been stated, will not exceed three hundred and fifty, or at most between that and four hundred.

The effect of this circuitous route is, at present to cut off the communication, almost entirely, with that country.

But the second object for which we wish this road opened, viz: for commercial purposes, is still more important to our citizens; and is essential for the prosperity of our country.

The only mode by which the people of that country can, at this time, convey their produce to market, is by boating it down the river Tennessee into the Ohio, then along that to the Mississippi, and down that river to New Orleans. Our boatmen employed in this trade are obliged to return by land, as the same boats that carry produce down those rivers, cannot ascend them, and there is but little navigation yet, in boats of any kind, up those waters into the State of Tennessee; and no boats of any considerable burden can pass up the river Tennessee, through the Muscle Shoals, to the eastern part of the State. The only route by which those boatmen can now return from New Orleans, is that already stated, on which the mail is conveyed, being between four and five hundred miles more than they would have to travel by the proposed route. The present road also passes over the Cumberland mountain, a part of which is very bad, and a wilderness at this part of the route, subject to the Indian claim, of between seventy and one hundred miles, without inhabitants. It also passes through another wilderness between Nashville and Natchez, subject to the Indian claim, of about four hundred miles, a considerable part of which is stated to be very bad road in winter, and that there are many large water courses to be passed. The difficulties are so great that few of our citizens are willing to embark in this trade, and our farmers, having no convenient vent for their surplus produce, have little or no inducement to industry beyond what may be necessary to produce the ordinary supplies of subsistence. This in a very great degree retards the progress of agriculture, and consequently the prosperity of our country. It is therefore hoped that this House will feel disposed to encourage the farming interests of our infant country by removing those obstacles to its progress that the State authority is incompetent to effect, and that prove so materially injurious to the interests of our citizens. Here it may be proper to remark that this proposed road, so far as it is desired to be established by this measure, passes through a country belonging entirely to the United States, except about sixty miles, and most of it subject to the claim of Indian tribes, being the Mississippi Territory until it enters West Florida, or Orleans Territory. This distance of about sixty miles alluded to, is from Tellico, on the frontiers of the settlements in East Tennessee, to a point beyond the south boundary of that State in the State of Georgia, and near the limits of the Mississippi Territory, being also subject to the Indian claim. A road has already been authorized to be opened in this direction; has been viewed and designated by commissioners appointed for that purpose from our State, at the expense of the State, and it is expected, by this time, has been opened, being designed to afford us a communication with the State of Georgia. This road will answer the proposed route—at least as far as the limits of our State—being, as before stated, about sixty or seventy miles from Tellico, and about one hundred from Knoxville. There will therefore remain only about one hundred miles (or very little more, if any,) to be opened, to the point at which the road, proposed from Georgia will intersect this route. From this view of the subject, it will appear we do not require the United States to be at any expense in opening a road within the limits of the State of Tennessee, but only to open it through a country belonging exclusively, except the Indian claim, to the United States. With regard to the roads proposed to be opened from Georgia to the Tombigbee settlements, so as to intersect the former road at the most convenient point between Tellico and the said settlements, what has been advanced to show the necessity of the former road will apply with equal force to this. The only route by which the people of Georgia can at present communicate with New Orleans, by means of the mail, or travel to that place along any authorized road, is that already stated, from Knoxville; thence by Natchez to New Orleans; and the people, even on the frontiers of that State, have to travel nearly three hundred miles to Knoxville to take this route, and are not then much, if any, nearer New Orleans than when they set out. This in a great degree cuts off this communication with that country. The road proposed to be opened from Georgia, according to the best information, will intersect the road from Knoxville, near the junction of Coosa and Tallapoosa rivers, and about two hundred miles, or somewhat more, from the latter place—of which, as already stated, one hundred miles at least are opened, and only about one hundred remain to be opened. The country through which the road from Knoxville will pass, is represented, by those who are acquainted with it, and who have resided many years among the Indian nations that inhabit it, to be a fine, open country, generally dry, without being broken by any mountains, and very few streams of any considerable size to be crossed, and no large rivers until you arrive at the Tombigbee. It will pass along the high lands that lie between the waters falling into the Tennessee river, and those that are discharged into the Coosa and Alabama rivers, and will require but little expense to be made a good road. We hope, therefore, upon viewing all those circumstances, Congress will agree to afford us the aid we require, and which is essentially necessary, to enable us to resort to the only market that will compensate our farmers for their industry, encourage agriculture and commerce, and promote the prosperity of our country.

H. OF R.

Post Roads.

FEBRUARY, 1805.

When Mr. W. had concluded, the Committee rose and had leave to sit again.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims, of the twenty-second ultimo, on the petition of Alexander Scott, of the State of South Carolina, on behalf of himself and others. And after progress, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 8.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the twenty-second ultimo, a memorial of the delegates appointed by various sections of the District of Columbia, reported a bill farther additional to, and amendatory of, an act, entitled "An act concerning the District of Columbia;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the same committee, also reported a bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

An engrossed bill to appropriate a sum of money for the purpose of building gun-boats, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LOWNDES, one of the members for the State of South Carolina, presented to the House an act of the Legislature of the said State, passed the twenty-first of December, one thousand eight hundred and four, entitled "An act to authorize the City Council of Charleston, with the consent of Congress, to impose and levy a duty on the tonnage of ships and vessels, for the purposes therein mentioned;" which was read, referred to Mr. LOWNDES, Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. JOSEPH CLAY,

Mr. McCREERY, and Mr. NEWTON, to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. MORROW, from the committee appointed on the seventh ultimo, presented a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act making provision for the disposal of the public lands in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. SOUTHARD said it would be well recollected by the House, that, during the last session of Congress, a resolution was introduced into the House which had for its object the imposing of a tax of ten dollars on every slave imported into the United States.

A bill predicated on that resolution was brought in, but was postponed, and not finally acted on. Mr. S. said he had waited with an expectation that some other member would have brought the subject again before the House, but as no member had thought proper to do it, and the session is drawing towards a close, he would move the following resolution.

Resolved, That a tax of ten dollars be imposed on every slave imported into the United States."

Referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The House, then, in pursuance of a resolution of the fourth instant, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and again proceeded, in that capacity, to the Senate Chamber, to attend the trial, by the Senate, of the impeachment against Samuel Chase, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee returned into the chamber of the House, and Mr. SPEAKER having resumed the Chair, Mr. VARNUM, from the said Committee of the Whole House, reported that the Committee had again attended the trial by the Senate of the said impeachment, and that a further progress had been made therein.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land within the Territory of Orleans, in the district of Louisiana;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and five," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims, on the petition of Alexander Scott, respecting the slaves taken by the Cherokee Indians in 1794.

After some time spent in considering the same, the Committee rose and reported their concurrence in the report of the Committee of Claims, that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition, and the documents accompanying the same. The report was agreed to by the House, on a division—55 in favor, and 24 against it.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the Postmaster General to make a new contract for carrying the mail from Fayetteville, in North Carolina, to Charleston, in South Carolina:" Whereupon, the said amendment, together with the bill, was committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

SATURDAY, February 9.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land within the Territory of Orleans, and the district of Louisiana," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and five:" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendment.

Mr. CROWNSHIELD, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to make Plymouth, in North Carolina, a port of entry; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the committee to whom was referred, on the fourth instant, the report of the Secretary of War in relation to sundry claims to land for military services rendered in the late Revolutionary war, in pursuance of an act passed the nineteenth of March last, reported a bill authorizing the Secretary of War to issue military land warrants, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Tuesday next.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

Mr. LATIMER, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory, made the following report:

The memorialists represent that, by that part of the ordinance for the government of the Mississippi Territory, which requires a freehold in fifty acres of land as a qualification of an elector of representatives, many of their respectable fellow-citizens, who are possessed of considerable personal property, houses, town lots, and small tracts of land, are deprived of their elective franchise; and that, by the act authorizing the establishment of a government in the said Mississippi Territory, the appointment of representatives is very unequal in the different counties mentioned in that act; they, therefore, solicit that the aforesaid ordinance may be so amended that, having been a citizen of one of the United States, having resided two years in the Territory, and, in either case, having paid a county or territorial tax, assessed at least six months previous to such election, may be the qualification required of an elector of representatives; and that the aforementioned act, authorizing the establishment of a government in the Mississippi Territory, may be so amended that the General Assembly of the said Territory may have power to apportion the representatives in the different counties, according to the number of free male inhabitants above the age of twenty-one years, in such counties, so that there shall not be less than ten, nor more than twelve, of the whole number of representatives.

From a recurrence to the ordinance for the government of the Mississippi Territory, it appears that there is no difference between the qualifications required therein, and those solicited in the memorial, except the freehold in fifty acres of land, which has been already mentioned. The only question, therefore, relative to this part of the subject is, whether it be expedient to dispense with such a qualification.

If the possession of property were at all essential to the qualification of an elector of representatives, your committee cannot see any good reasons why persons possessing considerable personal property, houses, town lots, and tracts of land less than fifty acres, and otherwise qualified, should be precluded from a participation in the right of suffrage with those who possess a freehold in fifty acres of land, which the ordinance requires. But, believing it inexpedient to limit the exercise of that right by any species of property qualification, your committee conceive that it ought to be extended agreeably to the wishes of the memorialists.

In the first section of the act of May 10, 1800, supplemental to the act authorizing the establishment of a government in the Mississippi Territory, it is "Provided, That, until the number of free male inhabitants of full age in the said Territory, shall amount to five thousand, there shall not be returned to the General Assembly more than nine representatives."

Your committee have no means of ascertaining the number of inhabitants of the above description, at this time, in the Mississippi Territory. But believing that no objection, except that of some additional expense to the Territory, can arise to the admission of two or three additional representatives, they can perceive no necessity for a continuance of the restrictive provision above quoted. Nor can they perceive any impropriety in authorizing the Legislature of the Territory to apportion the representatives in the manner requested. And your committee ask leave to report a bill for effecting the purposes which they herein consider as expedient.

The report was referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. LATTIMORE reported a bill extending the right of suffrage in the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last appointed.

DRAWBACK OF DUTIES

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the memorial of Stephen Kingston, of the city of Philadelphia, merchant, made the following report:

Stephen Kingston, the memorialist, on the 22d and 23d of July, 1801, entered outwards, at the custom-house of Philadelphia, took out a regular permit, and actually shipped on board the United States frigate George Washington, Captain John Shaw, then destined for Algiers, three bales of cinnamon, fifteen bales of India goods, and eleven hogsheds of loaf sugar, for benefit of drawback and bounty,

All the proceedings at the custom-house, previous to the shipment, appear to have been perfectly regular. The articles were entered outwards, in the usual manner, and an inspector attended to their delivery on board the lighter, and, so far as the committee can discover, the memorialist was willing to comply with every requisite formality at the custom-house, which was enjoined by the laws; yet, it is proved to your committee, that an error was committed by the inspector, in exporting the merchandise. The George Washington was preparing to get under way, and proceed down the Delaware, when the lighter came alongside, and the captain being of opinion that the ship would draw too much water to pass the bar in the river, if the articles were then received on board, ordered the lighter to follow the ship, and they were taken in below the bar, and at some distance out of the Philadelphia district.

In the case under consideration, the articles would have been liable to seizure and confiscation, if they had been relanded in Philadelphia, without permission from the collector. The exporter, therefore, was, in some measure, compelled to ship them on the George Washington; and in doing this, he appears to have pursued a safe and prudent line of conduct; for, if he had peremptorily ordered the lighter to return to Philadelphia, with her loading, he might have exposed himself to a prosecution for an attempt to commit a fraud on the revenue; and his property to almost certain confiscation. Although it is understood that permission was granted in this case, the committee are of opinion that our public vessels ought not to be permitted to carry merchandise for account of private individuals; but as no prohibition then existed to prevent similar shipments, the George Washington having been permitted to clear out in the usual manner, it is conceived that the exporter ought not to lose the drawback, merely because the articles were exported in a national vessel. On the whole, the exporter having complied with the existing regulations of the custom-house, previous to the delivery of the merchandise on board the lighter, and it not appearing that the deviation from the ordinary course which was subsequently committed, proceeded from his fault or neglect, the committee are impressed with an opinion (the irregularity, too, being committed by a captain in the service of the United States) that the memorialist has an equitable claim upon the Government for the drawback and bounty arising on the exportation of the articles mentioned in his memorial, upon the proof being exhibited to the Secretary of the Treasury that the same were actually landed out of the limits of the United States; and the committee submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the memorial of Stephen Kingston is reasonable and ought to be granted.

The report was ordered to lie on the table.

COLLECTOR'S BOND.

Mr. JOSEPH CLAY, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the petition of Anthony Benezet and others, children and surviving heirs of Daniel Benezet, late of the City of Philadelphia, deceased, made the following report:

That Daniel Benezet, the younger brother to the petitioners, was appointed, in March, 1790, collector of the port of Great Egg Harbor, in the State of New Jersey; Daniel Benezet the elder, his father, became his surety in a bond for two thousand dollars, given for the faithful discharge of his duties in that office.

Daniel Benezet, the younger, rendered no account for settlement at the Treasury subsequent to the 30th June, 1791, although repeatedly urged to do it; he continued in the office until the 7th of March, 1795, when he was superseded by the appointment of Constant Somers, who had been his deputy.

Daniel Benezet, the elder, died in April, 1797, and his estate was settled and divided among the heirs, of whom Daniel Benezet, the younger, was one, in the beginning of the year 1798.

Daniel Benezet, the younger, received for his share of his father's estate a sum of money amounting to more than five thousand dollars; he died in December, 1798, and his estate was sold to pay his debts, and finally settled in the year 1801, as far as it was in the power of his administrators and heirs to settle it.

In the year 1802, seven years after his dismissal, his administrator was, for the first time, applied to by the Comptroller of the Treasury for some books and papers, which, it had been intimated, related to the transaction of the custom-house of Great Egg Harbor, with a request that they might be delivered to the then collector. This request could not be complied with, as no such books, and very few trifling papers, were in the possession of the administrator; the attorney for the district of New Jersey was then directed to commence a suit on the official bond; but finding that the parties interested all lived in Pennsylvania, he gave notice of that circumstance to the Comptroller, upon which the District Attorney for Pennsylvania was, by a letter bearing date the 12th of August, 1803, directed to institute a suit for the recovery of the penalty. On the 7th of October, 1803, suit was accordingly brought against the administrators of Daniel Benezet, the elder, and judgment was entered by agreement in favor of the United States, for two thousand dollars, with a stay of execution for six months. It was also agreed, that, if, before the expiration of that time, the defendants could satisfy the Comptroller that they were entitled to be released, in whole or in part, from the amount of the judgment, it should accordingly be endorsed on the Comptroller's certificate. The Comptroller having no authority to release any part of the judgment, the petitioners have applied to Congress for relief. By an act of Congress, passed September 2d, 1789, it is made the duty of the Comptroller to "provide for the regular and punctual payment of all moneys which may be collected," and to direct prosecutions for all delinquencies of officers of the revenue."

By an act of Congress, passed August 4th, 1790, it was made the duty of the collectors, once in every three months, or oftener if required, to transmit their accounts for settlement.

Although Daniel Benezet, the younger, was frequently pressed to forward his accounts for settlement, and refused or neglected to do so, and although he was dismissed from office, probably for delinquency, yet no steps were taken to recover from him the penalty of his bond, during his life, nor from his or his father's estate, until the year 1802, eleven years after his appointment, seven years after his dismissal, five years after the death of his father, and four years after the final settlement and division of his father's estate, and after his own death.

Had any application been made previously to the settlement of either of the estates, the penalty of the bond might have been recovered and paid out of his own effects. But, from the delay, and not to say neglect, of the then Comptroller, no steps were taken until the whole of his property was disposed of, in payment of his private debts.

When it is considered that policy has dictated, in all countries, a limitation of the time in which ordinary debts between individuals may be recovered, and that the humanity of the Government has determined that even penalties and forfeitures, for crimes against the revenue laws, shall not be imposed upon the offenders unless the prosecution be had within a limited time; and particularly, when it is considered that statutes of limitation have been passed, to prevent the allowance of claims against the United States, unless brought before a certain period—claims, too, of the most meritorious nature—it is submitted to Congress whether a consistent regard to justice does not forbid the rigorous exaction of the sum adjudged against the petitioners, especially as the delay has arisen from the negligence of the officers of the Government. Your committee conceiving this case to be extremely severe, think the petitioners entitled to the relief for which they pray, and recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners is reasonable, and ought to be granted.

The report was ordered to lie on the table.

TO THE HISTORY OF THE EIGHTH CONGRESS.

LOUISIANA.

[Communicated to Congress January 16, 1804.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

In execution of the act of the present session of Congress for taking possession of Louisiana, as ceded to us by France, and for the temporary government thereof, Governor Claiborne of the Mississippi Territory, and General Wilkinson, were appointed Commissioners to receive possession. They proceeded, with such regular troops as had been assembled at Fort Adams from the nearest posts, and with some militia of the Mississippi Territory, to New Orleans. To be prepared for anything unexpected which might arise out of the transaction, a respectable body of militia was ordered to be in readiness in the States of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, and a part of those of Tennessee was moved on to the Natchez. No occasion, however, arose for their services. Our Commissioners, on their arrival at New Orleans, found the Province already delivered by the Commissaries of Spain to that of France, who delivered it over to them on the twentieth day of December, as appears by their declaratory act accompanying this. Governor Claiborne, being duly invested with the powers heretofore exercised by the Governor and Intendant of Louisiana, assumed the government on the same day, and, for the maintenance of law and order, immediately issued the proclamation and address now communicated.

On this important acquisition, so favorable to the immediate interests of our Western citizens, so auspicious to the peace and security of the nation in general, which adds to our country territories so extensive and fertile, and to our citizens new brethren to partake of the blessings of freedom and self-government, I offer to Congress and our country my sincere congratulations.

JAN. 16, 1804.

TH. JEFFERSON.

CITY OF NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 20, 1803.

SIR: We have the satisfaction to announce to you, that the Province of Louisiana was this day surrendered to the United States by the Commissioner of France; and to add, that the flag of our country was raised in this city amidst the acclamations of the inhabitants.

The enclosed is a copy of an instrument of writing, which was signed and exchanged by the Commissioners of the two Governments, and is designed as a record of this interesting transaction. Accept assurances of our respectful consideration.

WM. C. C. CLAIBORNE,
JAMES WILKINSON.

JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

The undersigned, William C. C. Claiborne, and James Wilkinson, commissioners or agents of the United States, agreeably to the full powers they have received from Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States, under date of the 31st October 1803, and twenty-eighth year of the independence of the United States of America, (8th Brumaire, 12th year of the French Republic,) countersigned by the Secretary of State, James Madison, and citizen Peter Clement Laussat, Colonial Prefect, and Commissioner of the French Government, for the delivery, in the name of the French Republic, of the country, territories, and dependencies of Louisiana, to the commissioners or agents of the United States, conformably to the powers, commission, and special mandate which he has received, in the name of the French people, from citizen Bonaparte, First Consul, under date of the 6th June, 1803, (17th Prairial, eleventh year of the French Republic,) countersigned by the Secretary of State, Hugues Maret, and by his Excellency the Minister of Marine and Colonies, Decrees, do certify by these presents, that on this day, Tuesday, the 20th December, 1803, of the Christian era, (28th Frimaire, twelfth year of the French Republic,) being convened in the hall of the Hotel de Ville of New Orleans, accompanied on both sides by the Chiefs and Officers of the Army and Navy, by the municipality and divers respectable citizens of their respective Republics, the said William C. C. Claiborne and James Wilkinson, delivered to the said citizen Laussat their aforesaid full powers, by which it evidently appears that full power and authority has been given them jointly and severally to take possession of, and to occupy the territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th day of April last past,

The Cession of Louisiana.

(10th Floreal,) and for that purpose to repair to the said Territory, and there to execute and perform all such acts and things, touching the premises, as may be necessary for fulfilling their appointment conformably to the said treaty and the laws of the United States; and thereupon the said citizen Laussat declared that, in virtue of, and in the terms of the powers, commission, and special mandate dated at St. Cloud, 6th June, 1803, of the Christian era, (17th Prairial, 11th year of the French Republic,) he put from that moment the said Commissioners of the United in possession of the country, territories, and dependencies of Louisiana, conformably to the first, second, fourth, and fifth articles of the treaty and two conventions, concluded and signed the 30th April, 1803, (10th Floreal, 11th year of the French Republic,) between the French Republic and the United States of America, by citizen Barbé Marbois, Minister of the Public Treasury, and Messrs. Robert R. Livingston and James Monroe, Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States, all three furnished with full powers, of which treaty and two conventions the ratifications, made by the First Consul of the French Republic on the one part, and by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, on the other part, have been exchanged and mutually received at the City of Washington, the 21st October, 1803, (28th Vendémiaire, 12th year of the French Republic,) by citizen Louis André Pichon, Chargé des Affaires of the French Republic near the United States, on the part of France, and by James Madison, Secretary of State of the United States, on the part of the United States, according to the procès verbal drawn up on the same day; and the present delivery of the country is made to them, to the end that, in conformity with the object of the said treaty, the sovereignty and property of the colony or province of Louisiana may pass to the said United States, under the same clauses and conditions as it had been ceded by Spain to France, in virtue of the treaty concluded at St. Ildefonso, on the 1st October, 1800, (9th Vendémiaire, 9th year,) between these two last Powers, which has since received its execution by the actual re-entrance of the French Republic into possession of the said colony or province.

And the said citizen Laussat in consequence, at this present time, delivered to the said Commissioners of the United States, in this public sitting, the keys of the city of New Orleans, declaring that he discharges from their oaths of fidelity towards the French Republic, the citizens and inhabitants of Louisiana, who shall choose to remain under the dominion of the United States.

And that it may forever appear, the undersigned have signed the procès verbal of this important and solemn act, in the French and English languages, and have sealed it with their seals, and have caused it to be countersigned by the secretaries of commission, the day, month, and year above written.

Proclamation by His Excellency, William C. C. Claiborne, Governor of the Mississippi Territory, exercising the powers of Governor General and Intendant of the Province of Louisiana.

Whereas, by stipulations between the Governments of France and Spain, the latter ceded to the former the colony and province of Louisiana, with the same extent which it had at the date of the above-mentioned treaty in the hands of Spain, and that it had when France possessed it, and such as it ought to be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States; and whereas the Government of France has ceded the same to the United States by a treaty duly ratified, and bearing date the 30th of April in the present year, and the possession of said colony and province is now in the United States, according to the tenor of the last mentioned treaty; and whereas the Congress of the United States on the 31st day of October, in the present year, did enact that, until the expiration of the session of Congress then sitting, (unless provisions for the temporary government of the said territories be made by Congress,) all the military, civil, and judicial powers, exercised by the then existing government of the same, shall be vested in such person or persons, and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct, for the maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of Louisiana in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion; and the President of the United States has, by his commission, bearing date the same 31st day of October, invested me with all the powers, and charged me with the several duties heretofore held and exercised by the Governor General and Intendant of the Province.

I have, therefore thought fit to issue this, my proclamation, making known the premises, and to declare, that the government heretofore exercised over the said Province of Louisiana, as well under the authority of Spain as of the French Republic has ceased, and that of the United States of America is established over the same; that the inhabitants thereof will be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; that, in the meantime, they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess; that all laws and municipal regulations which were in existence at the cessation of the late government, remain in full force; and all civil officers charged with their execution, except those whose powers have been especially vested in me, and except, also, such officers as have been intrusted with the collection of the revenue, are continued in their functions, during the pleasure of the Governor for the time being, or until provision shall otherwise be made.

And I do hereby exhort and enjoin all the inhabitants, and other persons within the said province, to be faithful and true in their allegiance to the United States, and obedient to the laws and authorities of the same, under full assurance that their just rights will be under the guardianship of the United States, and will be maintained from all force or violence from without or within.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand.

Given at the city of New Orleans, the 20th day of December, 1803, and of the independence of the United States of America, the twenty-eighth.

The Governor's Address to the citizens of Louisiana.

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 20, 1803.

FELLOW-CITIZENS OF LOUISIANA: On the great and interesting event now finally consummated—an event so advantageous to yourselves, and so glorious to United America—I cannot forbear offering you my warmest congratulations. The wise policy of the Consul of France has, by the cession of Louisiana to the United States, secured to you a connexion beyond the reach of change, and to your posterity the sure inheritance of freedom. The American people receive you as brothers, and will hasten to extend to you a participation in those inestimable rights which have formed the basis of their own unexampled prosperity. Under the auspices of the American Government, you may confidently rely upon the security of your liberty, your property, and the religion of your choice. You may with equal certainty rest assured that your commerce will be promoted and your agriculture cherished—in a word, that your true interests will be among the primary objects of our National Legislature. In return for these benefits, the United States will be amply remunerated if your growing attachment to the Constitution of our country, and your veneration for the principles on which it is founded, be duly proportioned to the blessings which they will confer. Among your first duties, therefore, you should cultivate with assiduity among yourselves the advancement of political information. You should guide the rising generation in the paths of republican economy and virtue. You should encourage literature; for without the advantages of education, your descendants will be unable to appreciate the intrinsic worth of the Government transmitted to them.

As for myself, fellow-citizens, accept a sincere assurance, that during my continuance in the situation in which the President of the United States has been pleased to place me, every exertion will be made on my part to foster your internal happiness, and forward your general welfare; for it is only by such means that I can secure to myself the approbation of those great and just men who preside in the councils of our nation.

WM. C. C. CLAIBORNE.

[The following papers, relating to the opposition of Spain to the cession of Louisiana to the United States, were transmitted to Congress with the President's Message of November 8, 1804.]

Extract of a letter from Don Pedro Cevallos, Minister of State of his Catholic Majesty, to Mr. Charles Pinckney, dated at the Pardo, February 10, 1804.

"At the same time the Minister of His Majesty in the United States is charged to inform the American Government respecting the falsity of the rumor referred to, he has likewise orders to declare to it that His Majesty has thought fit to renounce his opposition to the alienation of Louisiana made by France, notwithstanding the solid reasons on which it is founded; thereby giving a new proof of his benevolence and friendship towards the United States."

Copy of a letter from the Marquis of Casa Yrujo to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, May 15, 1804.

SIR: The explanations which the Government of France has given to His Catholic Majesty concerning the sale of Louisiana to the United States, and the amicable dispositions on the part of the King my master towards these States, have determined him to abandon the opposition which, at a prior period, and with the most substantial motives, he had manifested against that transaction. In consequence, and by special order of His Majesty, I have the pleasure to communicate to you his royal intentions on an affair so important; well persuaded that the American Government will see, in this conduct of the King my master, a new proof of his consideration for the United States, and they will correspond, with a true reciprocity, with the sincere friendship of the King, of which he has given so many proofs.

God preserve you many years.

JAMES MADISON, Esq.

To all whom these presents shall come: Whereas, by an act of Congress, authority has been given to the President of the United States, whenever he shall deem it expedient, to erect the shores, waters, and inlets of the bay and river of Mobile, and of the other rivers, creeks, inlets, and bays, emptying into the Gulf of Mexico, east of the said river Mobile, and west thereof to the Pascagoula, inclusive, into a separate district for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, and to establish such place within the same as he shall deem it expedient to be the port of entry and delivery for such district; and to designate such other places within the same district, not exceeding two, to be ports of delivery only:

Now know ye, That I, Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States, do hereby decide, that all the above mentioned shores, waters, inlets, creeks, and rivers, lying within the boundaries of the United States, shall constitute and form a separate district, to be denominated "the district of Mobile;" and do also designate Fort Stoddert, within the district aforesaid, to be the port of entry and delivery for the said district.

Communicated to the Senate, October 24, 1803.

To the Senate of the United States:

I lay before you the convention* signed on the 12th day of May last, between the United States and Great Britain, for settling the boundaries in the northeastern and northwestern parts of the United States, which was mentioned in my general Message of the 17th instant, together with such papers relating thereto as may enable you to determine whether you will advise and consent to its ratification.

OCTOBER 24, 1803.

In order that the boundaries between the territories of His Britannic Majesty and those of the United States of America may be more precisely ascertained and determined than has hitherto been done, the parties have respectively named their Plenipotentiaries, and given them full powers to negotiate and conclude a convention for this purpose; that is to say, His Britannic Majesty has named for his Plenipotentiary the Right Honorable Robert Banks Jenkinson, commonly called Lord Hawkesbury, one of His Majesty's most honorable Privy Council, and his principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate thereof, has appointed for their Plenipotentiary, Mr. Rufus King, their Minister Plenipotentiary to his said Majesty; who have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The line hereinafter described shall and hereby is, declared to be the boundary between the mouth of the river St. Croix and the Bay of Fundy; that is to say, a line beginning in the middle of the channel of the river St. Croix, at its mouth, as the same has been ascertained by the Commissioners appointed for that purpose; thence through the middle of the channel between Deer island on the east and north, and Moose island, and Campo Bello island on the west and south, and round the eastern point of Campo Bello island to the Bay of Fundy; and the islands and waters northward and eastward of the said boundary, together with the island of Campo Bello, situated to the southward thereof, are hereby declared to be within the jurisdiction and part of his Britannic Majesty's Province of New Brunswick; and the islands and waters southward and westward of the said boundary, except only the island of Campo Bello, are hereby declared to be within the jurisdiction and part of Massachusetts, one of the said United States.

ART. 2. Whereas, it has become expedient that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, mentioned and described in the Treaty of Peace between His Majesty and the United States, should be ascertain and determined; and that the line between the source of the river St. Croix, and the said northwest angle of Nova Scotia, should be run and marked, according to the provisions of the said Treaty of Peace: It is agreed that for this purpose, Commissioners shall be appointed in the following manner, viz; one Commissioner shall be named by His Majesty and one by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof; and the said two Commissioners shall agree in the choice of a third; or, if they cannot agree, they shall each propose one person; and of the two names, so proposed, one shall be taken by lot in presence of the two original Commissioners; and the three Commissioners, so appointed, shall be sworn impartially to ascertain and determine the said northwest angle of Nova Scotia, pursuant to the provisions of the said Treaty of Peace; and likewise to cause the said boundary line between the source of the river St. Croix, as the same has been determined by the Commissioners appointed for that purpose, and the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, to be run and marked according to the provisions of the Treaty aforesaid. The said Commissioners shall meet at Boston, and have power to adjourn to such place or places as they shall think fit; they shall have power to appoint a secretary and employ such surveyors, and other assistants, as they shall judge necessary: the said Commissioners shall draw up a report of their proceedings which shall describe the line aforesaid, and particularize the latitude and longitude of the place ascertained and determined, as aforesaid, to be the northwest angle of Nova Scotia; duplicates of which report, under the hands and seals of the said Commissioners, or of a majority of them, together with duplicates of their accounts, shall be delivered to such persons as may be severally authorized to receive the same in behalf of their respective Governments; and the decision and proceedings of the said Commissioners, or a majority of them, made and had as aforesaid, shall be final and conclusive.

ART. 3. It is further agreed that the said Commissioners, after they shall have executed the duties assigned them in the preceding article, shall be, and they hereby are, authorized, upon their oaths, impartially to ascertain and determine the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, according to the provisions of the aforesaid Treaty of Peace; and likewise to cause the boundary line described in the said Treaty of Peace, between the northwest angle of Nova Scotia and the said northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, to be run and marked pursuant to the provisions of the said Treaty. The said Commissioners shall meet at Boston, and have power to adjourn to such other place or places as they shall think fit. They shall have power to appoint a secretary, and employ such surveyors and other assistants as they shall judge necessary. The said Commissioners shall draw up a report of their proceedings, which shall describe the boundary line aforesaid, and particularize the latitude and longitude of the westernmost head of Connecticut river, duplicates of which report, under the hands and seals of the said Commissioners, or of a majority of them, together with duplicates of their accounts, shall be delivered to such persons as may be severally authorized to receive the same, in behalf of their respective Governments; and the decision and proceedings of the said Commissioners, or of a majority of them, made and had as aforesaid, shall be final and conclusive.

ART. 4. It is further agreed that the aforesaid Commissioners shall be respectively paid in such manner as shall be agreed between the two parties, such agreement to be settled at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of this Convention, and all other expenses incurred by the said Commissioners shall be defrayed jointly by the two parties, the same being previously ascertained and allowed by the said Commissioners; and, in case of death, sickness, or necessary absence, the place of any Commissioner shall be supplied in the same manner as such Commissioner was appointed, and the new Commissioner shall take the same oath, and do the same duties.

ART. 5. Whereas it is uncertain whether the river Mississippi extends so far to the northward as to be intersected by a line drawn due west from the Lake of the Woods, in the manner mentioned in the Treaty of Peace between His Majesty and the United States, it is agreed that, instead of the said line, the boundary of the United States in this quarter shall, and is hereby declared to be the shortest line which can be drawn between the northwest point of the Lake of the Woods and the nearest source of the river Mississippi: and for the purpose of ascertaining and determining the northwest point of the Lake of the Woods and the source of the river Mississippi that may be nearest to said northwest point, as well as for the purpose of running and marking the said boundary line between the same, three Commissioners, upon the demand of either Government, shall be appointed, and authorized, upon their oaths, to act; and their compensation and expenses shall be ascertained and paid, and vacancies supplied, in the manner provided in respect to the Commissioners mentioned in the preceding articles; and the decisions and proceedings of the said Commissioners, or of a majority of them, made and had pursuant to this convention, shall be final and conclusive.

In faith whereof, we the undersigned, Ministers Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty and of the United States of America, have signed this present convention, and caused to be affixed thereto the seals of our arms.

RUFUS KING. [L. S.]

The Secretary of State to Rufus King, Minister, &c., of the United States to Great Britain.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 28, 1801.

SIR: By the Treaty of Peace, the mouth of the St. Croix is supposed to be in the bay of Fundy. But as the Commissioners have, in their decision, settled the mouth of that river, called the Schoodiac, to be in Passamaquoddy Bay, at a place called Joe's Point, it is left undetermined to which nation the islands in the last mentioned bay, and the passages through them, into the bay of Fundy, belong. It appears to have been the intention of the two nations, in adjusting their limits at the peace, to make navigable waters, where they were the boundary, common to both, by a divisional line running through the middle of their channels. Hence, it is believed, that, if it be true that one of the passages from the mouth of the river, intended as the St. Croix, into Fundy bay, be seldom and imperfectly navigable, and the other constantly and completely so, it will be most conformable to the Treaty of Peace to establish it as the boundary. Supposing, on the other hand, that the Treaty of Peace should be literally executed, as far as practicable, and the line drawn from Joe's Point, due eastwardly, Great Britain would be excluded from both passages. At present, it is believed that the following description of the passage to be settled as the boundary, would be satisfactory to both nations: "Beginning in the middle of the channel of the river St. Croix, at its mouth; thence, direct, to the middle of the channel, between Pleasant Point and Deer island; thence to the middle of the Channel, between Deer island on the east and north, and Moose island and Campo Bello island on the west and south, and round the eastern point of Campo Bello island, to the bay of Fundy. The other (western) channel has a bar across it, which is dry at low water.

These ideas are thrown out only for consideration. I shall probably have it in my power shortly to transmit you a commission to settle this point, with definitive instructions. Meanwhile, you may break the business to the British Ministry, but without implicating any fixed mode of settlement.

RUFUS KING, &c.

The Secretary of State to Mr. King.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 8, 1802.

SIR: You will herewith receive a commission, giving you powers to adjust, by proper stipulations, with the British Government, whatever remains to be decided in relation to the boundary between the two nations.

In executing the first part of this trust, relating to the bay of Passamaquoddy, you will recur to the observations contained in my letter of the 28th of July last. I refer you also to a copy, herewith enclosed, of a letter from Judge Sullivan, heretofore agent of the United States, on the controversy regarding the river St. Croix, in answer to some inquiries from me on the subject now committed to you. His information and his reasoning will be useful in the discussion; and, to illustrate both, I also enclose herewith a copy of the map to which he refers in the beginning of his letter.

The essential objects to be secured to the United States are, the jurisdiction of Moose island, and the common navigation of the bay, and the channels leading to the sea between Deer island and the island of Campo Bello. To the observations of Judge Sullivan, in support of the rights of the United States, it need only be added, that the outlet through Moose island being the only adequate communication with the sea from a great and valuable territory of the United States, they are entitled to the full use of it on that principle, as well as on others, and with the less pretext for objection, as the trifling island of Campo Bello is the only territory held by Great Britain on one side of the channel.

In pursuance of the next object, viz: the establishment of boundaries between the United States and New Brunswick, on one side, and of Canada on another, it will be proper to provide for the immediate extension of the line which is to run from the south of the St. Croix, and which is represented as necessary to guard against interfering or encroaching grants under American and British authorities. As the course of this line is to be due north, and is to proceed from the point fixed by a survey already made, the running of it will be sufficiently provided for by an appointment of a Commissioner by each of the two Governments, and an appointment, by the two Commissioners, of a surveyor. In fixing the point at which the line is to terminate, and which is referred to as the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, the difficulty arises from a reference of the Treaty of 1783 "to the highlands," which it is now found have no definitive existence. To remove this difficulty, no better expedient occurs than to provide for the appointment of a third Commissioner, as in article five, of the Treaty of 1794; and to authorize the three to determine on a point most proper to be substituted for the description in the second article of the Treaty of 1783, having due regard to the general idea that the line ought to terminate on the elevated ground dividing the rivers falling into the Atlantic, from those emptying themselves into the St. Lawrence. The Commissioners may also be authorized to substitute for the description of the boundary between the point so fixed, and the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, namely, a line drawn along the said highlands, such a reference to intermediate sources of rivers, or other ascertained or ascertainable points, to be connected by straight lines, as will admit of easy and accurate execution hereafter, and as will best comport with the apparent intention of the Treaty of 1783.

The remaining provision necessary to complete the boundary of the United States will be a stipulation amending the second article of the Treaty of 1783, in its description of the line which is to connect the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods with the Mississippi. The description supposes that a line running due west from that point, would intersect the Mississippi. It is now well understood that the highest source of the Mississippi is south of the Lake of the Woods; and, consequently, that a line, due west, from its most northwestern point, would not touch any part of that river. To remedy this error, it may be agreed that the boundary of the United States, in that quarter, shall be a line running from that source of the Mississippi which is nearest to the Lake of the Woods, and striking it, westwardly, as a tangent, and, from the point touched, along the water-mark of the lake, to its most northwestern point, at which it will meet the line running through the lake. The map in McKenzie's late publication is probably the best to which I can refer you on this subject.

From the mutual and manifest advantage to Great Britain and the United States, of an adjustment of all uncertainties concerning boundary, it is hoped you will find a ready concurrence in all the propositions which you will have to make to them. Should difficulties or delays threaten those which relate to the boundary connecting the Mississippi and the Lake of the Woods, or that connecting the Connecticut river and the point to be established as the northeast corner of the United States, it will be proper to separate from these the other subjects of negotiation, and to hasten the latter to a conclusion.

With the highest respect and consideration,
&c. JAMES MADISON.

RUFUS KING, Esq.

Boston, May 20, 1802.

SIR: Having the honor of receiving your letter of the 10th inst., I hasten to communicate to you my ideas of the subject-matter of its contents.

When I was under a commission, as agent of the United States, on the controversy with Great Britain regarding the river St. Croix, I forwarded to the office of the Secretary of State a map of the bay of Passamaquoddy, of the Schoodiac, and of the lines of the whole dispute. That map was accurately and elegantly composed from astronomical observations and actual surveys. As that map is under your eye, there is no need of my sending a fac-simile; but I refer you to that for an explanation of this letter.

The Treaty of 1783 with Great Britain evidently contemplates a river, as the St. Croix, which has its mouth in the bay of Fundy. Both rivers claimed by the parties empty their waters in the bay of Passamaquoddy. The agent of the United States urged the Commissioners to settle the boundary through that bay to the sea; because the treaty expressly recognised the mouth of the river as in the bay of Fundy, which is a limb of the ocean, and the other bay united with it might be considered as the river's mouth; but they declined it, on an idea that their commission extended no further than to an authority to find the mouth and source of the river, and that, let whichever would be the river, it had its mouth three leagues from the sea, in Passamaquoddy bay; they, therefore, limited their decision on its southerly line, to a point between St. Andrews and the shore of the United States.

The whole of the waters of Passamaquoddy, eastward and northward of Moose island, and of the island of Campo Bello, are navigable for vessels of any burden. The channel between Moose and Deer island is the best. The channel between Moose island and the continent of the United States is shoal, narrow, and not navigable for vessels of consequence. That between Campo Bello and the main, called the west passage, is rendered hazardous and dangerous by a bar of rocks, and is so narrow and shoal, that no vessel of considerable size will be risked there excepting on a fair wind, and at the top of high water. The tides there are exceedingly rapid, and rise near about fifty feet. Therefore, any settlement which would deprive the United States of a free navigation as far to the eastward and northward as the channel you propose; that is, to the one between Moose and Deer islands, and north of Campo Bello, would ultimately destroy the important commerce and valuable navigation of an extensive territory within the United States; for, as you may observe on the maps, there is no river of consequence between the Schoodiac and the Penobscot; and that the waters which issue from numerous and extensive lakes, in the interior parts of the country, running into the sea, as the Schoodiac, will give an advantageous and invaluable transportation to the articles of commerce.

Your construction of the Treaty of 1783, which renders the waters dividing the nations common to both, (where they are navigable,) must be reasonable and just. The English people have, in many instances, practised upon the treaty under such a construction. There has been no interruption to the American navigation, in any part of Passamaquoddy bay; but our vessels have proceeded through that bay to the shore of the United States, at and near Moose island, and have gone into the Schoodiac, above St. Andrew's point, and anchored on the western side of the channel, where they have discharged their cargoes. There have been some seizures where goods have been carried from those vessels over to the English side, but the goods have been condemned, and the vessel discharged. These seizures being made within the jurisdiction of the United States, as to the vessels, were clearly infractions of the law of nations.

There was a seizure lately made of a vessel of one Goddard of Boston. She was taken from her anchor on the American side of the channel, in the river established by the Commissioners as the St. Croix, and carried over to New Brunswick: but she was acquitted by the Court of Admiralty, with damages and costs. Campbell, who made the seizure, appealed to England, merely to avoid the costs and damages, where the cause is now depending under the attention of Robert Slade, a proctor, who is the advocate for Mr. Goddard.

There is a clause in the treaty, that the United States shall comprehend the islands within twenty leagues of any of the shores of the United States, and lying between lines drawn due east from the aforesaid boundaries, between Nova Scotia on the one part, and East Florida on the other, as they shall respectively touch the bay of Fundy, and the Atlantic ocean. This circumstance, that the mouth of the St. Croix is settled to be between St. Andrew's point on the east, and the American shore on the west, three leagues within the island of Campo Bello, draws this consequence to the treaty, that nearly all the islands in Passamaquoddy bay are within the United States, by the above provision in the treaty, unless they are taken out by an exception, which I shall presently notice. A line, due east (as you will see on the plan) from the Schoodiac mouth at St. Andrew's point, takes in nearly all the bay. A line south, sixty-seven degrees east, will go to the north of Campo Bello, and take two-thirds of Deer island on the west. A southeast line, from the middle of the Schoodiac mouth, passes on the channel between Moose and Deer islands, and through the centre of Campo Bello.

The consequences attached to this provision may be, in some measure, controlled by an exception annexed to it in these words, "excepting such islands as now are, or heretofore have been, within the limits of the Province of Nova Scotia."

The island of Campo Bello is confessedly within the exception, and, therefore, it may be said that the principle of common privilege to navigable waters will not give our nation a right to a navigation northward of, and between, that and the other islands in the bay, because that they, being all within the same exception, the right of a common navigation in both nations may not extend to the waters between that and them. But the answer to this is, that the clause establishes the jurisdiction of the United States, by lines which clearly include all the islands in the bay of Passamaquoddy, and all within the bay of Fundy comprehended to the south of the east line drawn from St. Croix; while the exception can extend only to the islands formerly within the jurisdiction of Nova Scotia, inclusive of the privileges necessary to the occupancy of them. The principle, therefore, of the common right to navigation or navigable waters which divide two nations, cannot apply here; because, in that case, the line of national jurisdiction seems to be settled on the channel; but here, in this case, the jurisdiction is definite, express, and ceded, according to the lines agreed on, as above described.

The ancient charter of Nova Scotia to Sir William Alexander, in 1638, included all the country from the Kennebeck to the bay of Chaleur. The treaty cannot mean, by the expression "heretofore within Nova Scotia," all the islands in that charter. If it mean the islands which were within a more recent description of it, where the boundary westward was the St. Croix, excluding the territory of Acadia, which was placed under the jurisdiction of Massachusetts, by the charter of that Province in 1692, and bounded on that river, the river Schoodiac being now the established St. Croix, there can be no question in regard to Massachusetts extending to the channel where it joins that river. But Moose island, which I have described before, lies two leagues below what the Commissioners made the mouth of the St. Croix, and very near the American shore. This was never granted by the Crown of England, or by the Government of Nova Scotia, before the Treaty of Peace; nor was there ever an occupancy of it by subjects acknowledging the authority of Nova Scotia; nor did that Province ever attempt to exercise authority there. Long before the Revolutionary war, it was in the occupancy of the people of, and from the late Province of Massachusetts Bay. The soil has, I believe, been granted by that Province, or by the State since the Revolution, to the people who had it in possession. I do not know the date of the grant. There have been, as I am informed, recent grants by the Province of New Brunswick of that island; but no formal claim on the part of the English nation has been made to it. The grantees of that Province, who have speculated on the pretended right of the English nation, have excited civil officers, under the authority of the Province of New Brunswick, to attempt to execute precepts there. These attempts were repelled, and I have not heard that they have been recently renewed. Should the jurisdiction of that island be found within the English authority, there can be no doubt how the right of property would be settled. This renders the dispute of consequence to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in a pecuniary point of view.

If the argument above stated does not prove that the jurisdiction of the United States is extended to all the waters of Passamaquoddy bay, but that the treaty leaves the navigable waters of the same, which form the natural boundaries common to both, it is of great consequence, that any claim made under the Crown of the English Empire to Moose island should be subverted. But if their having the island under the reservatory exception does not deprive the United States of the jurisdiction on all the waters southward of the east line, drawn from the mouth of the Schoodiac, the consideration of the property alone gives consequence to the question.

The channel where the waters more directly issue from the Schoodiac to the bay of Fundy, between Moose and Deer islands, and between Deer island and Campo Bello, as described in your letter of instructions to the Minister, is quite adequate to all navigation of our country.

You mention a resolve of the Legislature, wherein the subject of the navigation in Passamaquoddy bay is mentioned. I have attended to a resolve of the tenth of March, which proposes that the Governor should request the President of the United States to take measures for settling the disputed jurisdiction to certain islands in Passamaquoddy bay; but I do not know of any dispute in that bay as to islands, excepting what I have stated as to Moose island.

The settlement and plain establishment of a line from the head or source of the Cheputnatecook, which is the source of the St. Croix, and empties its waters through a long chain of lakes into the Schoodiac, has become necessary, because that Massachusetts is making grants of the lands in that quarter, and the province of New Brunswick is in the same practice, controversies may be created by interfering locations in pursuance of, or under pretence of, those grants. Such controversies can have no guide to their adjustment, excepting lines drawn through a vast extent of wilderness, where many known and unknown causes will affect the magnetic variations. These disputes on national, or even colonial, or State jurisdiction, are not easily settled when they are connected with private claims.

By the Treaty of Peace, it is provided that the boundaries shall be "from the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, viz., that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north, from the source of the St. Croix, to the highlands; along the highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence, from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean, to the northwestern-most head of Connecticut river."

You will see by the maps of that part of the country, that the line which runs north from the source of the St. Croix, crosses the river St. John a great way south of any place which could be supposed to be the highlands; but where that line will come to the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, and find its termination, is not easy to discover.

The boundary between Nova Scotia and Canada was described, by the King's proclamation, in the same mode of expression as that used in the Treaty of Peace. Commissioners who were appointed to settle that line, have traversed the country in vain to find the highlands designated as a boundary. I have seen one of them, who agrees with the account which I have had from the natives and others, that there are no mountains or highlands on the southerly side of the St. Lawrence, and northeastward of the river Chaudiere. That, from the mouth of the St. Lawrence to that river, there is a vast extent of high flat country, thousands of feet above the level of the sea, in perpendicular height; being a morass of millions of acres, from whence issue numerous streams and rivers, and from which a great number of lakes are filled by drains. That the rivers originating in this elevated swamp pass each other wide asunder, many miles in opposite courses, some to the St. Lawrence, and some to the Atlantic sea.

Should this description be founded in fact, nothing can be effectively done, as to a Canada line, without a commission to ascertain and settle the place of the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, wherever that may be agreed to be; if there is no mountain or natural monument, an artificial one may be raised. From thence, the line westward to Connecticut river may be established by artificial monuments erected at certain distances from each other; the points of compass from the one to the other may be taken; and the ascertaining the degree of latitude, which each one is placed on from actual observation, may be very useful. Though there is no such chain of mountains as the plans or maps of the country represent under the appellation of the highlands, yet there are eminences from whence an horizon may be made to fix the latitude from common quadrant observations.

In the description of the morass, which is said to crown the heights between the United States and Lower Canada, it ought to have been noticed, that, those swamps are vastly extensive, yet, in the acclivity from the Atlantic to their highest elevation, as well as in their declivity to the St. Lawrence, great tracts of valuable country are interspersed. On the banks of the river Chaudiere, and perhaps on the banks of other rivers, running to the St. Lawrence, the settlements are approaching fast towards those of the United States. This circumstance will soon render an established line of national jurisdiction absolutely necessary.

Should there be anything within my power which will give aid to the Government on this occasion, you will please to command me.

I am, sir, with sentiments of sincere respect, your most humble servant,

JAS. SULLIVAN.

HON. JAMES MADISON.

Mr. Gore to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, October 6, 1802.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your several letters to Mr. King, under the following dates, viz: 8th June, 20th, 23d, and 26th of July, and 23d of August; the latter by Mr. Brent: all of which came to hand since his absence from this place. That of June 8th, covering commission and instructions to this gentleman to adjust whatever remains to be decided in relation to the boundaries between the United States and the British Government, was received, and forwarded to him before he left Harwich.

According to his desire, and with a view to expedite the business, I requested an interview of Lord Hawkesbury, for the purpose of making to him such communications on this subject as might enable him to enter on the negotiation with effect, on the return of Mr. King. After having opened the business at our first meeting, he requested it might lay over until Mr. Hammond, the under Secretary of State, should come from the seaside, where he then was for his health, to afford him an opportunity of conferring with this gentleman, who was much acquainted with the business to which the communication referred. On Mr. Hammond's arrival, I saw Lord Hawkesbury, and, with the map of the St. Croix, as reported by the Commissioners under the fifth article of the Treaty of 1794, and Arrowsmith's map of the United States, endeavored to trace out the boundaries that were still requisite to explain to him the views of the President, and to impress on his mind the reasonableness and justice thereof, in regard to the British nation. He appeared disposed to accede to the propositions, so far as they relate to the boundary line through the Passamaquoddy, the mode suggested of adjusting that between the United States and New Brunswick, and fixing the point intended in the Treaty of 1783, by the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, and establishing the boundary between such point and the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river. It is, however, to be understood, that the disposition manifested by his lordship was founded on the belief that, on inquiry, he should find the islands in Passamaquoddy bay to have been possessed by, and to belong to, the respective nations as the proposed line would place them; and that, on further reflection, no insurmountable objection should occur to the plan proposed for running the other lines and fixing the point referred to. On these subjects, he doubtless intends to consult with Colonel Barclay, the British Commissioner for ascertaining the St. Croix, who is now in some part of Great Britain, and who is expected in London early in the Winter. On that part of the boundary which is to connect the northwest point of the Lake of the Woods with the Mississippi, he observed that it was evidently the intention of the Treaty of Peace that both nations should have access to, and enjoy the free use of that river; and he doubtless meant that this access should be to each nation through their own territories. He remarked, that commissions, which I had proposed for ascertaining the relation of the Lake of the Woods and the Mississippi, if any doubt remained on this head, and running the line between these two waters, according to your proposition, might establish such a boundary as would secure to each nation this object. To the remark I made no reply, other than by observing that the line suggested was what naturally seemed to be demanded by just interpretation, where such a mistake had happened, as was herein supposed; but this I did, however, chiefly with a view of not assenting to his proposal, and in a manner rather declining than courting the discussion. It will probably be persisted in; and I much doubt if the Government will be inclined to adjust any boundary in this quarter, that has not the right desired for its basis.

I have considered it important to apprise you of the view entertained by the British Government in this respect, that the President may have an opportunity, if he should choose, to forward Mr. King any instructions relative to the boundary in question. The papers marked A, herewith enclosed, are copies of the notes that passed from me to Lord Hawkesbury, and minutes of the proposals made him in conversation, and traced out on the maps before mentioned, and of his note in reply. These, with the above detail of what passed in conversation, will communicate to you all that has been, or probably will be, done on this subject, before Mr. King's return, which may be expected in November, and doubtless before Lord Hawkesbury will have an opportunity of consulting the persons alluded to in his note.

Your letter of 20th July, with the enclosed copy of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Comptroller, respecting the portages, or carrying places, and the exemption from duty of small vessels trading between the northern and northwestern boundaries, came to hand on the 10th of September, and I lost no time in stating their contents to Lord Hawkesbury in a note, (copy whereof is herewith enclosed,) in order to rebut any argument in favor of the pretensions of the British traders, from a supposed acquiescence on the part of the Government of the United States and to insist on such a construction of the terms, portages, and carrying places, as might comport with the safety of the revenue of the United States, and the interest of their citizens. I afterwards had a conference with him on this subject, in which he acceded to the construction contained in my note; and, as to the tonnage duty, he said it certainly merited, and should receive, all due consideration.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, sir, your obedient and humble servant,
C. GORE.

Mr. Gore to Lord Hawkesbury.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE,
August 24, 1802.

Mr. Gore presents his compliments to Lord Hawkesbury, and has the honor to inform him that, since the departure of Mr. King, he has received for this gentleman instructions and a full power from the President of the United States, to adjust, by amicable negotiation, with the Government of His Britannic Majesty, whatever remains unsettled as to the boundaries between the territories of the two nations.

Mr. Gore takes the liberty of proposing to his Lordship to communicate to him, whenever he shall be at leisure to attend thereto, the views of the President of the United States, in order that his Lordship may give to the subject such consideration as he shall think its importance requires; and that, having a distinct knowledge thereof, his Lordship may, on the return of Mr. King, be enabled to concur in such measures for defining and settling the boundary lines between the two countries, as shall appear most conducive to their mutual interests and future harmony.

Mr. Gore flatters himself that Lord Hawkesbury will see, in this proposal of the President, a new proof of the sincere and earnest desire of the Government of the United States to live in friendship with that of His Britannic Majesty, inasmuch as it invites to an adjustment, by amicable negotiation, of not only whatever may now be the occasion of inquietude between the parties, but also of everything, as far as can be foreseen, which may interrupt in future that good understanding so essential to the interests and happiness of both nations.

Mr. Gore to Lord Hawkesbury.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE,
September 22, 1802.

Mr. Gore presents his compliments to Lord Hawkesbury, and has the honor to inform him that the President of the United States, ever desirous to continue uninterrupted the harmony so happily subsisting between the Government of said States and that of His Britannic Majesty, and by a constant vigilance and unremitted attention to every circumstance that might have a tendency, however remote, to disturb the same, in order to prevent its effect by such seasonable interposition as the occasion may require, has given directions that it should be represented to His Majesty's Government, that certain traders, subjects of His Britannic Majesty, have set up pretensions to transport goods and merchandise, free of duty, through certain rivers, and over tracts of country, in the northwestern parts of the United States, and entirely within their jurisdiction, under the clause of the third article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between the said United States and His Britannic Majesty, which provides "that no duties shall be payable on any goods which shall merely be carried over any of the portages, or carrying places, on either side, for the purpose of being immediately re-embarked, and carried to some other place or places."

Mr. Gore flatters himself that, if his Lordship should take the trouble to look into the article referred to, he will see that such claims derive no support from the most liberal construction of the terms relied on, namely, the right to carry goods, exempt from duty, "over portages or carrying places;" and that these words, so used, can never intend other cases than where the waters forming a boundary between the parties become unnavigable, and where a transit by land is thence required and resorted to, in order to re-enter the common waters where they are again navigable.

While the United States are actuated by the most sincere and earnest desire to give every facility to the trade and commerce of the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, not inconsistent with a due regard to the rights of their own citizens, and the safety of their revenue, they have been obliged to resist, as incompatible with these, pretensions so unauthorized, and must speedily make such regulations in this respect, as the security of their public revenue renders indispensable; not, however, interfering, in the smallest degree, with the rights of His Britannic Majesty's subjects, under the stipulations of said treaty, which will always be held sacred by the Government of the United States.

Mr. Gore has also the honor, according to the instructions of his Government, to represent to Lord Hawkesbury, that the United States, with a view to render the intercourse as convenient and free as possible to their citizens and the subjects of His Britannic Majesty living in the north and northwestern boundaries of said States, and in the British provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, and thereby promote a good understanding between the inhabitants thereof, by removing all impositions on the vessels of either trading there, at their last session passed an act to exempt from tonnage duty all vessels, whether British or American, not above fifty tons burden, trading between the ports of the northern and northwestern boundaries of the United States, and the British provinces of Upper and Lower Canada.

He is also directed further to represent to His Majesty's Government, that vessels of the United States, in the British ports, within the same waters, are subject to a duty of six cents per ton. The disposition manifested by His Majesty's Government to concur in equalising the situation of vessels of the two countries, and to do it rather by abolishing than assimilating the duties on them, raises an expectation, on the part of the President of the United States, that His Majesty's Government will be disposed to place vessels belonging to citizens of said States, in such British ports, on an equality with those of the subjects of His Majesty in the ports of the United States within said waters.

Mr. Gore to Lord Hawkesbury.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE,
September 28, 1802.

Mr. Gore presents his compliments to Lord Hawkesbury, and has the honor to transmit, herewith enclosed, minutes of what he took the liberty to suggest, in conversation with his Lordship this morning, relative to the unascertained boundaries between the United States and the possessions of His Britannic Majesty.

Mr. Gore requests, his Lordship will please to consider them, conformably to his declaration then personally made to his Lordship, as intended to afford a general idea of the views of the President of the United States on the subject to which they relate, rather than containing proposals not liable to modification, at the will of the American Government, or its representative; it being distinctly understood that the same may be altered as reflection shall suggest to Mr. King, or any other person to whom the negotiation may be committed at a future day, should it not be finished by this gentleman in the ensuing Winter, of which, however, Mr. Gore will not permit himself to doubt, as so many reasons concur to evince the fitness of the present time for adjusting and establishing, for the mutual benefit of the parties, the boundaries referred to; which, being left open and unsettled until, as the natural and almost inevitable consequence of such a state of things, private gain and individual passion shall intermingle themselves in the question, will prove the most fruitful source of difference and misunderstanding between two nations whose essential interests demand the most amicable and friendly intercourse.

MINUTES, &c.

Boundaries from the mouth of the St. Croix, through the Bay of Passamaquoddy, and to the Atlantic ocean.

Beginning in the middle of the river St. Croix, at its mouth; thence, direct to the channel between Pleasant point and Deer island on the east and north, and Moose island and Campo Bello on the west and south, and round the northeastern point of Campo Bello island, to the Bay of Fundy.

Boundaries between the United States and New Brunswick.

In tracing and establishing the boundary between the United States and New Brunswick, there may be some question what are the highlands intended by the Treaty of Peace?

8th CON. 2d SES.—40

To run the line from the source of the St. Croix, and fix the point at which it is to terminate, no mode more proper seems to suggest itself than that of instituting a commission, and appointing Commissioners, as in the fifth article of the treaty of 1794; the report of whom to ascertain and establish this part of the boundary, as in the second article of the treaty of 1783, having due regard to the idea that the line ought to terminate on the ground dividing the rivers falling into the Atlantic from those emptying themselves into the St. Lawrence.

The same Commissioners may be authorized to substitute for the description of the boundary between the point so fixed and the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, a line drawn along the said highlands, with such reference to intermediate sources of rivers by straight lines, as will admit of easy and accurate execution hereafter, and best comport with the apparent intentions of the treaty of 1783.

Boundary from the Lake of the Woods to the Mississippi.

The second article of the treaty of 1783, supposes that the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods may be connected with the Mississippi, by running a line due west from that point, and that a line so drawn would intersect that river.

The highest source of the Mississippi is now supposed to be south of the Lake of the Woods, and consequently a line due west from its northwestern point will not touch any part of said river.

If this be true, some provision is necessary to complete the boundary of the United States and the British possessions in this quarter, by amending the second article of the treaty of 1783 in that respect, according to the stipulations of the fourth article of the treaty of 1794.

Supposing the most northern branch of the source of the Mississippi to be south of the Lake of the Woods, as seems now to be understood, it is suggested, as consistent with justice and the mutual convenience of the parties, to establish the boundary of the United States in this quarter, by a line running from that source of the Mississippi which is nearest to the Lake of the Woods, and striking it westwardly, as a tangent, and from the point touched along the watermark of the lake to its most northwestern point, at which it will meet the line running through the lake.

Commissioners might be appointed to ascertain the local relation of the Mississippi to the Lake of the Woods, and, if as was supposed by the Treaty of Peace, to run the line there agreed on. But if the relative situation of these two waters be as now believed, to establish the boundary by running a line as above described.

** To the original were added the second article of the definitive Treaty of Peace of 1783; the fourth article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce and Navigation, &c. of 1794, (both which articles relate to the boundaries;) and the following

"The Lake of the Woods is in latitude 49° 37' north, and longitude 94° 31' west.

"The northernmost branch of the source of the Mississippi is in latitude 47° 38' north, and longitude 95° 6' west, ascertained by Mr. Thomson, astronomer to the Northwest Company, who was sent expressly for that purpose in the spring of 1798. He, in the same year, determined the northern bend of the Missouri to be in latitude 47° 32' north, longitude 101° 25' west; so that, if the Missouri were even to be considered as the Mississippi, no western line could strike it."—History of the Fur Trade, page 85.

Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. Gore.

DOWNING STREET, Oct. 4, 1802.

Lord Hawkesbury presents his compliments to Mr. Gore, and has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of his note of the 28th ultimo, together with the minutes which were enclosed in it.

Lord Hawkesbury is fully sensible of the expediency of adjusting, by some definitive arrangement, the several points to which those minutes refer, and will be ready to enter into a negotiation for that purpose either with Mr. Gore or Mr. King, within as short a period as the circumstances of the case will conveniently admit. In the mean time, it may perhaps be necessary for Lord Hawkesbury to obtain information from persons in the country on some of the subjects which are likely to be brought into discussion. But Mr. Gore may be assured that Lord Hawkesbury is desirous of avoiding any unnecessary delay, and that he will feel the sincerest disposition to terminate the negotiation in such a manner as may be reciprocally advantageous both to Great Britain and to the United States, as may tend, by removing all causes of future dispute, to improve and conciliate the harmony and good understanding which so happily subsists between the two countries, and which are so essential to their several interests and prosperity.

Extract.—The Secretary of State to Rufus King, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

By the communications of the 6th day of October, received from Mr. Gore, it appears that the proposition for adjusting the boundary in the northwest corner of the United States is not relished by the British Government. The proposition was considered by the President as a liberal one, inasmuch as the more obvious remedy for the error of the treaty would have been by a line running due north from the most northern source of the Mississippi, and intersecting the line running due west from the Lake of the Woods; and inasmuch as the branch leading nearest the Lake of the Woods may not be the longest or most navigable one, and may consequently favor the wish of the British Government to have access to the latter. The proposition, for these reasons, would not have been made but from a desire to take advantage of the present friendly dispositions of the parties for the purpose of closing all questions of boundary between them. As it is not probable, however, that the settlement of this particular boundary will for some time be material, and as the adjustment proposed is not viewed by the British Government in the same light as by the President, it is thought proper that it should not for the present be pursued; and that the other questions of boundary should be adjusted with as little delay as possible. In the meantime, further information with respect to the head waters of the Mississippi, and the country connected with them, may be sought by both parties; it being understood that the United States will be as free to be guided by the result of such inquiries, in any future negotiation, as if the proposition above referred to had never been made by them. Should it be most agreeable to the British Government to have an early survey instituted, with a view to a proper boundary in this case, the President authorizes you to concur in such an arrangement.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, February 28, 1803.

SIR: I have duly received your letters of 16th and 23d December. By Lord Hawkesbury's desire, I have conferred with Colonel Barclay respecting the continuation of the boundary through the bay of Passamaquoddy, who has made no objection to the line we have proposed, though he appears to think that it would be improper to cede to us the island of Campo Bello, unless the cession should be desired by its inhabitants. No objection has been made to our title to Moose island; and at present I foresee nothing to impede a settlement of this boundary, except the difficulty of engaging the Minister to bestow upon the subject sufficient time to understand it. With regard to the line between the source of the St. Croix and the northwest corner of Nova Scotia, I have no reason to suppose there will be any objection to its being ascertained in the way we have proposed. Not having been able to fix the attention of Lord Hawkesbury upon the subject, I am not able to give you any information concerning the line between the northwest corner of Nova Scotia and the head of Connecticut river, or between the Lake of the Woods and the Mississippi.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,
RUFUS KING.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, May 13, 1803.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith the convention which I yesterday signed, in triplicate, with Lord Hawkesbury, relative to our boundaries.

The convention does not vary anything material from the tenor of my instructions. The line through the bay of Passamaquoddy secures our interest in that quarter. The provision for running, instead of describing, the line between the northwest corner of Nova Scotia and the source of the Connecticut river has been inserted, as well on account of the progress of the British settlements towards the source of the Connecticut, as of the difficulty in agreeing upon any new description of the manner of running this line, without more exact information than is at present possessed of the geography of the country.

The source of the Mississippi nearest to the Lake of the Woods, according to McKenzie's report, will be found about twenty-nine miles to the westward of any part of that lake, which is represented to be nearly circular. Hence, a direct line between the northwesternmost part of the lake, and the nearest source of the Mississippi, which is preferred by this Government, has appeared to me equally advantageous with the lines we had proposed.

With respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

RUFUS KING.

Report of the Committee of the Senate on the foregoing Convention.

Mr. Adams, from the committee to whom the treaty with Great Britain, signed at London, on the 12th of May, 1803, was referred, reported thereon, as follows:

That, from the information they have obtained, they are satisfied that the said treaty was drawn up by Mr. King three weeks before the signature of the treaty with the French Republic of the 30th of April, and signed by Lord Hawkesbury, without the alteration of a word; and that it had, in the intention of our Minister, no reference whatsoever to the said treaty with the French Republic, inasmuch as he had no knowledge of its existence. But, not having the means of ascertaining the precise northern limits of Louisiana, as ceded to the United States, the committee can give no opinion whether the line to be drawn, by virtue of the third article of the said treaty with Great Britain, would interfere with the said northern limits of Louisiana or not.

[The following papers were communicated to the Senate with the foregoing report.]

Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State.

DECEMBER 16, 1803.

SIR: Some difficulty having arisen in the Senate, in considering the expediency of advising and consenting to the ratification of the Treaty of Limits between the United States and Great Britain, signed on the 12th of May, 1803, a committee of that body has been appointed to inquire and report upon the subject.

The difficulty arises from the circumstance that the treaty with the French Republic, containing the cession of Louisiana, was signed on the 30th of April, 1803, twelve days earlier than that with Great Britain; and some apprehension is entertained that the boundary line, contemplated in the third [fifth] article of the latter, may, by a possible future construction, be pretended to operate as a limitation to the claims of territory acquired by the United States in the former of these instruments.

But, as the ratification, if it can be effected without unnecessary delay, is a desirable object, it has occurred to the committee that Mr. King may possibly have it in his power to give information which might remove the obstacle. I have, therefore, in behalf of the committee, to ask whether, from any information in possession of your Department, or which may be obtained, in such manner as you may deem expedient, it can be ascertained whether the third article of the treaty with Great Britain was concluded with any reference whatsoever to that with the French Republic, or with any right or claim which the United States have acquired by it.

I am, with much respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The SECRETARY OF STATE.

The Secretary of State to Mr. Adams.

DECEMBER 16, 1803.

SIR: Having transmitted to Mr. King the inquiry contained in your letter of —, I have received the answer, of which a copy is enclosed. The Office of State possesses no further information on the particular point in question with the committee.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES MADISON.

Rufus King to the Secretary of State.

NEW YORK, Dec. 9, 1803.

SIR: The draught of the Convention with Great Britain respecting boundaries, having been settled in previous conferences, was drawn up and sent by me to Lord Hawkesbury on the 11th of April; on the 12th of May the Convention was signed, without the alteration of a word of the original draught; and, on the 15th of May, the letter of Messrs. Livingston, and Monroe, (a copy of which was annexed to my No. 100,) announcing the treaty of cession with France, was received and communicated by me to Lord Hawkesbury. At the date of the signature of the Convention with Great Britain, I had no knowledge of the treaty with France; and have reason to be satisfied that Lord Hawkesbury was equally uninformed of it. It results, that the Convention with Great Britain was concluded without any reference whatsoever to the treaty of cession with France.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, your most obedient faithful servant.

RUFUS KING.

MOROCCO.

[Communicated to the Senate, November 4, 1803.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States :

By the copy, now communicated, of a letter from Captain Bainbridge, of the Philadelphia frigate, to our Consul at Gibraltar, you will learn that an act of hostility has been committed on a merchant vessel of the United States, by an armed ship of the Emperor of Morocco. This conduct on the part of that Power, is without cause and without explanation. It is fortunate that Captain Bainbridge fell in with and took the capturing vessel and her prize. And I have the satisfaction to inform you, that, about the date of this transaction, such a force would be arriving in the neighborhood of Gibraltar, both from the East and West, as leaves less to be feared for our commerce, from the suddenness of the aggression.

On the 4th September, the Constitution frigate, Captain Preble, with Mr. Lear on board, was within two days sail of Gibraltar, where the Philadelphia would then be arrived with her prize, and such explanations would probably be instituted as the state of things required, and as might, perhaps, arrest the progress of hostilities.

In the meanwhile it is for Congress to consider the provisional authorities which may be necessary to restrain the depredations of this Power, should they be continued.

TH. JEFFERSON.

NOVEMBER 4, 1803.

U. S. FRIGATE PHILADELPHIA,
East of Malaga about ten miles.
August 29, 1803.

DEAR SIR: I wrote you from Gibraltar on the 24th instant, mentioning that we should sail the next morning for Malta.

Hearing at the Rock that two Tripolitans were off Cape de Gatt, made me proceed with all expedition to examine that part of the Spanish coast. On the 26th, it blowing very fresh, at 8 P. M. being nearly up with Cape de Gatt, fell in with a ship carrying only her foresail, which had a brig in company, under the same sail. It being night, and her guns housed, prevented an immediate discovery of her being a cruiser. After hailing for some time, found that she was a vessel of war from Barbary. On which information, I caused her boat to be sent on board the frigate Philadelphia, with her passports, from which I discovered that she was a cruiser belonging to the Emperor of Morocco, called Meshboba, commanded by Ibrahim Subarez, mounting twenty-two guns, and manned with one hundred men. By not making ourselves known to the officer who came on board, he confessed that the brig in company was an American, and had been with them three or four days; was bound to some port in Spain; had been boarded by them, but not detained. The low sail the brig was under induced me to suspect that they had captured her, notwithstanding their having your passport, which it must appear from the sequel was only obtained to protect them against the American ships of war. I sent my first lieutenant on board, to examine if they had any American prisoners. On his attempting to execute my orders, he was prevented by the captain of the cruiser. This increased my suspicion, and I sent a boat with armed men to enforce my intentions. After they were on board, they found Captain Richard Bowen, of the American brig Celia, owned by Mr. Amasa Thayer, of Boston, and several of his crew, who were taken the 17th instant from Barcelona, bound to Malaga, within two or three leagues of the Spanish shore, and about twenty-five miles to the eastward of Malaga. The captain and crew they had confined below deck, which they always did when speaking a vessel. After making this discovery, I instantly ordered all the Moorish officers on board the frigate, for I had no hesitation in capturing her after such proceeding on their part, and violation of the faith of passports, which ought to be sacred. Owing to the high wind and sea, it took me the greatest part of the night to get the prisoners on board, and man the prize; which detention occasioned losing sight of the brig. The following morning, discovering many vessels in divers directions, the day was spent by the frigate and prize in chasing to find the captured brig. About 4 P. M. made her coming round the Cape de Gatt from the eastward, standing close in shore for Almeida bay, owing to the wind being very fresh. We were going slow in approaching her: the greatest exertions were made by Lieutenant Cox, in towing and rowing the prize. Fortunately, the wind increased in the evening, and we recaptured her at 12 o'clock at night. The Moors confessed that they came out for the sole purpose of capturing Americans to besent to Tangier. I have received a paper from them, written in Moorish, which they say is their authority from the Governor of Tangier for so doing. I enclose this to John Gavine, Esq., with a particular request to have it safely conveyed to you, that you may be informed of the circumstances, and act accordingly. I believe the Governor of Tangier is much disposed for hostilities with the United States: the Moorish prisoners accuse him as the sole cause of their present situation. I sincerely hope that this capture may be productive of good effect to the United States with the Emperor, who may be assured that if he unjustly goes to war with the United States he will lose every large cruiser he has; and God grant that it may not in the least prove a disadvantage to you. My officers and self have made it a marked point to treat the prisoners not only with the lenity that is due from humanity, but with particular attention to civility, to impress on their minds a favorable opinion of the American character. That you may receive this information as early as possible, I despatch my boat on shore at Malaga, to request W. Kirkpatrick, Esq. Consul, to forward it by express to Gibraltar. I shall be extremely anxious to hear from you, as also for the arrival of Commodore Preble, to receive his instructions relative to the captured ships. I am bound to Gibraltar bay with the prize, but am fearful that we shall be detained for want of an eastwardly wind. I am, &c.

[Communicated to the Senate, December 5, 1803.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I have the satisfaction to inform you that the act of hostility mentioned in my Message of the 4th of November, to have been committed by a cruiser of the Emperor of Morocco on a vessel of the United States, has been disavowed by the Emperor. All differences in consequence thereof have been amicably adjusted, and the Treaty of 1786 between this country and that has been recognised and confirmed by the Emperor, each party restoring to the other what had been detained or taken. I enclose the Emperor's orders given on this occasion.

The conduct of our officers, generally, who have had a part in these transactions, has merited entire approbation. The temperate and correct course pursued by our Consul, Mr. Simpson, the promptitude and energy of Commodore Preble, the efficacious co-operation of Captains Rodgers and Campbell of the returning squadron, the proper decision of Captain Bainbridge, that a vessel which had committed an open hostility was of right to be detained for inquiry and consideration, and the general zeal of the other officers and men, are honorable facts which I make known with pleasure. And to these I add, what was indeed transacted in another quarter, the gallant enterprise of Captain Rodgers, in destroying, on the coast of Tripoli, a corvette of that Power of twenty-two guns. I recommend to the consideration of Congress a just indemnification for the interests acquired by the captors of the Mishouda and Mirboha, yielded by them for the public accommodation.

Praise be given to God alone. May God be propitious to our master Mahomet and to his family.

Know all those who shall see this noble writing—all our governors—those encharged with our affairs, and captains of our vessels, that the American nation are still, as they were, in peace and friendship with our person exalted by God.

Their vessels are safe both at sea and in port, and so are their merchants; and you are not to disturb the peace between us and them. What has happened with their and our vessels, has only been an affair among the vessels; but the said nation continues respected as they were with us, and under all security, and equally so their vessels.

Wherefore, we hereby order that all those of our governors; those charged with the command of our ports, and captains of our vessels who shall see this writing, that they act in all respects for the fulfilment of this order, and that they do not deviate therefrom; those who shall contravene it will be punished with a severe punishment.

This order was given on the 21st Chemadi, the second in the year 1218, (9th October, 1803.) and at last we are in peace and friendship with the said American nation, as our father (to whom God be merciful,) was, according to the Treaty made on the first day of Rhamadan, in the year 1200.

Our servant the Governor Ben Abdel Sadak, and all officers of our port of Mogadore: May God assist you. Peace, with the mercy and blessing of God, be with you.

Now know ye, that the Almighty having reconciled what had happened with the American nation because of the acts of the vessels, and that we are now, as we were before, with them in peace and friendship, as settled with our father, (to whom God be merciful!)—Take care—take care that none of you do anything against them, or show them any disrespect or disregard, for they are, as they were, in friendship and in peace, and we have increased our regard for them in consequence of the friendship they have manifested to our person, which God has exalted. And we order that you be careful and diligent in all their concerns, and we order that you do well with their vessels and with their merchants. Peace be with you all.

IMPRESSMENT OF AMERICAN SEAMEN.

[Communicated to Congress, December 5, 1803.]

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with the desire of the Senate, expressed in their resolution of the 22d November, on the impressment of seamen in the service of the United States by the agents of foreign nations, I now lay before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of State, with a specification of the cases of which information has been received.

TH. JEFFERSON.

DECEMBER 5, 1803.

Impressment of American Seamen.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Dec 2, 1803.

SIR: Agreeably to a resolution of the Senate, passed on the 22d of last month, requesting the President of the United States to cause to be laid before them such information as may have been received relative to the violation of the flag of the United States, or to the impressment of any seamen in the service of the United States, by the agents of any foreign nation, I do myself the honor to transmit to you the enclosed abstract of impressments of persons belonging to American vessels, which, with the annexed extracts from the letters of some of our agents abroad, comprises all the information on the subject that has been received by this Department since the report to Congress, at its last session, relative to seamen. To the first mentioned document I have added a summary showing the number of citizens of the United States impressed and distinguishing those who had protections as citizens; those who are stated to be natives of the British dominions, and not stated to be naturalized as citizens; and those of all other countries, who are not equally stated to have been naturalized in the United States.

Another source of injury to our neutral navigation has taken place in the blockade of Guadeloupe and Martinique, as notified in the annexed letter from Mr. Barclay, Consul General of His Britannic Majesty for the Eastern States.

Besides the above, I have received no official information of any material violations of our flag during the present European war, except in the recent aggressions of the Emperor of Morocco.

With very high respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MADISON.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

[The abstract of names is omitted. But the following is a summary of impressments by the British from American vessels:]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
December 2, 1803.

Forty-three impressments of citizens of the United States appear to have been made, of whom twelve had protections.

Ten of natives of the British dominions, and not stated to be naturalized as American citizens; and Seventeen of all other countries, who are not stated to have been naturalized in the United States.

Summary of Impressments by the agents of other Powers, from American vessels.

Two by the agents of France.

One by the agents of the Batavian Republic.

Extract of a letter from James Maury, Esq., Consul of the United States at Liverpool, to the Secretary of State.

MARCH 24, 1803.

"I had the honor to write to you on the 25th ultimo, since which the alarm of war has occasioned a great press for seamen. Many of ours, confident, as I suppose, in the continuance of peace, had not taken the caution, before leaving home, to be furnished with regular documents of citizenship, which exposes them to impressment."

Extract of a letter from John Fox, Esq., Consul of the United States at Falmouth, to the Secretary of State.

MAY 14, 1803.

"The impress is very severe. The citizens of the United States are not molested; two or three, without protections, and on board British ships, have been taken. I have made application for their release, but it is necessary that the seamen should bring certificates of their citizenship with them, otherwise they will run great risk of being impressed."

Extract of a letter from Wm. Savage, Esq., agent of the United States, for the relief and protection of their seamen at Jamaica, to the Secretary of State.

JUNE 25, 1803.

"There has been a hot press throughout this island. In this port about sixty seamen have been taken out of American vessels; immediately after which, I made application to the Admiral, who liberated the American citizens. Some few vessels on the north side have lost their men, and have experienced distress from the measure. The names of the persons impressed I have a minute of, and on the arrival of the frigates, in which they are, I shall make application for their discharge."

Copy of a letter from Thomas Barclay, Esq., Consul General of His Britannic Majesty for the Eastern States of the United States, to the Secretary of State.

OCTOBER 20, 1803.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose you the copy of a letter which I yesterday received from Commodore Hood, Commander-in-Chief of His Majesty's ships of war on the windward station, notifying the blockade of the islands of Martinique and Guadeloupe by the squadron under his command.

I have the honor, &amp;c.

THOMAS BARCLAY.

CENTAUR, OFF MARTINIQUE,
July 25, 1803.

SIR: I beg you will have the goodness to acquaint the American Government, and agents of neutral nations, the islands of Martinique and Guadeloupe are, and have been, blockaded by detachments of His Majesty's squadron, under my command, since the 17th June last, that they may have no plea for attempting to enter the ports of those islands. By your acknowledging the receipt of this, you will greatly oblige, sir, your most obedient servant,

SAMUEL HOOD,
Commodore and Commander-in-Chief.

SPAIN.

[Communicated to the Senate, Dec. 21, 1803.]

To the Senate of the United States :

On the 11th of January last, I laid before the Senate, for their consideration and advice, a convention with Spain on the subject of indemnities for spoiliations on our commerce, committed by her subjects during the late war; which convention is still before the Senate. As this instrument did not embrace French seizures and condemnations of our vessels in the ports of Spain, for which we deemed the latter Power responsible, our Minister at that Court was instructed to press for an additional article, comprehending that branch of wrongs. I now communicate what has since passed on that subject. The Senate will judge whether the prospect it offers will justify a longer suspension of that portion of indemnities conceded by Spain, should she now take no advantage of the lapse of the period for ratification. As the settlement of the boundaries of Louisiana will call for new negotiations on our receiving possession of that province, the claims not obtained by the convention now before the Senate may be incorporated into those discussions.

TH. JEFFERSON.

DECEMBER 21, 1803.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Charles Pinckney, Esq., Minister Plenipotentiary, &c., at Madrid, dated

MARCH 8, 1803.

The Convention signed with Spain in August, though laid before the Senate at an early day, had no question taken on it till the close of the session. It was then postponed till the next session, which is to commence in November. More than a majority, but less than two-thirds, which the Constitution requires, would have acquiesced in the instrument in its present form; trusting to the success of further negotiations for supplying its defects, particularly the omission of the claims founded on French irregularities. But it is understood that it would have been a mere acquiescence; no doubt being entertained that Spain is bound to satisfy the omitted as well as the included claims. In explaining, therefore, the course taken by the Senate, which mingles respect for the Spanish Government with a cautious regard to our own rights, you will avail yourself of the opportunity of pressing the reasonableness and the sound policy of remodelling the convention in such a manner as to do full justice. I need not repeat the observations heretofore made on the Spanish responsibility for the conduct of French citizens within Spanish jurisdiction; but it may be of use to refer you to the enclosed copy of a royal order issued by the Spanish Government in 1799, which will enable you to remind them of their own view of the subject at that time. In this document it is expressly declared, that the French consular jurisdiction was not admitted, and that French consuls in Spanish ports were in the same condition with those of every other nation. After such a declaration against the authority of French consuls, the Spanish Government would be chargeable with no less disrespect to the French Republic than to itself, in saying that Spain was not left at liberty to prevent an exercise of the usurped authority; and, if at liberty, she is indisputably answerable for the consequences of not preventing it. A document, which I add, will explain the just sentiments entertained by the Batavian Government during the same period, in relation to a case turning on the same principle.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Charles Pinckney Esq., Minister Plenipotentiary, &c., at Madrid, dated

MARCH 22, 1803.

As the convention you signed with Spain will be now submitted to further negotiation; it will be proper, in addition to the general remarks contained in preceding letters, to suggest some particular alterations which are calculated to remove doubts, and to provide for its convenient execution.

1st. The words "excesses of individuals," in the caption of the convention, are liable to exception. The term "excesses" has not a definite meaning in the sense in which it is here used, and "individuals" might be restricted at least as a purely English word to private citizens or subjects, as distinguished from those who are vested with public authority. The English part of the caption in the words quoted uses the preposition of in lieu of the Spanish words cometidas por, which are preferable.

It is believed that the form of words, "who have sustained losses, damages, or injuries, in consequence of the wrongs committed by the subjects or citizens of either nation, or under color of authority from it," &c., would be an improvement of importance.

2d. From the first section, it would seem that the fifth commissioner is to be appointed by the common consent of the two nations, or, in case of disagreement, by lot from two persons, one of whom is to be named by each nation. The formation of the board would be very much facilitated by substituting the agency of the commissioners on each side, in the appointment of the fifth commissioner either by consent or by lot.

3d. To equalise the compensation of the commissioners, to provide for the payment of the expenses of the board, and to obviate the case of the death, sickness, or necessary absence of either of them, the eighth article of the British Treaty will serve as an approved model.

4th. It would be desirable to add the words "justice, equity," before the laws of nations, &c. in the close of the second article, and a clause to the oath, whereby the commissioners should engage not to sit at the decision of a case in which they might as individuals be directly or indirectly interested.

5th. The third article limits the term within which claims are to be made to eighteen months; but the board should be vested with a power to extend it further in special cases, so as not to exceed two years in all. The close of this article admits of the same alteration as was suggested above with regard to the caption.

6th. A criticism, perhaps an unfounded one, having been made upon the word testimony, used in the fourth article, as if it were restricted to parole deposition, it may not be amiss to change it for the word evidence, or to couple them, so as to read "all testimony and evidence, the authenticity of which," &c.

A perseverance in our claims, grounded on the wrongs permitted to be done by French cruisers and tribunals, it is expected will produce a correspondent alteration in the whole convention, and a retrenchment of the sixth article. It will be obvious to you how convenient it will prove if you can terminate your negotiation so as to produce the requisite modifications of the convention in season to preclude its reconsideration in the Senate, at their next session, in its present shape.

Extract of a letter from Charles Pinckney, Esq., Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid, to the Secretary of State, dated

I find, by your letter of the 22d, that the convention signed with this country is to be submitted to further negotiation, on the ground, I suppose, principally, that it did not include the claims for French captures. Your letters, to which the only one I have received refers, have not yet come to hand, and therefore I only know it is to be submitted to further negotiation; and that with some alterations respecting the mode of appointing to vacancies in the commission; extending the time at the discretion of the board to two years; equalising the compensation; altering the terms "excesses of individuals," and the expression respecting testimony. I am to persevere in obtaining redress for the French captures and wrongs permitted to be done by French cruisers and tribunals, which will certainly produce, if obtained, an alteration in the whole convention. I have been some time endeavoring, in every conversation I have had, to obtain the promise to include the arbitration of the French captures; but without effect: for it may be necessary here to state, that, although Mr. Cevallos did positively, in one of his letters last summer, promise to include them, if I would add the words "segun los principios que constituyen la moralidad de las acciones," yet that very day, or a very short time after, when I had some inclination to add the words, and take the clause with that addition, he flew the way, and would not agree to it. I was, therefore, obliged to take the convention, such as it was, or none at all; and as it gave up nothing, secured very important and extensive claims, and opened the door to others, I always hoped the Senate would have ratified it conditionally, striking out the sixth article, and annexing one including the claims for French captures and condemnations, and ordering me, in very strong and decisive terms, to tell the Government here that they were determined to have the whole or none. Had this been done, I believe they would consent, and, as I suppose, the arbitration for the French captures and condemnations not being included was the principal objection to ratifying it at the present session, I shall now take that ground, and insist upon their being included, even if I am obliged to add the words he proposed to annex, and which I have already quoted. I shall also consider myself as not at liberty to sign any convention which does not include them in some manner that I think may be acceptable; but as this subject is one of the most grating and disagreeable that can be to the Spaniards, and as they consider it so extremely hard to be obliged to pay for the French condemnations, I wish to know your positive instructions, whether I am to make them an indispensable part of the convention, and not to sign or agree to any which does not include them in some shape. This is the ground I take at present; and as the Spaniards are not very quick in any of their negotiations, and are particularly crowded with business at this time, when they expect war between France and England, and of course that they will be involved, it is not improbable your instructions may reach me before I conclude the business. Should war take place, it is then very probable I shall succeed, and I shall govern the style of my representations by the probability or improbability of a rupture.

Mr. Pinckney to the Secretary of State.

MADRID, August 2, 1803.

DEAR SIR: My last despatches, and those which preceded them, will have conveyed to you the propositions I submitted to this Government on the subject of our claims, and particularly the captures and condemnations by the French; they will also have informed you of the anxious manner in which I have been expecting the arrival of Mr. Montoe since the 20th of May, hopeful that the instructions he would bring might enable me to add such offers, or bring the question of the spoiliations by the French in some manner before this Government, to tempt them to accede to our propositions. After waiting until nearly the beginning of this month,* I received a letter from Mr. Monroe and Mr. Livingston, acquainting me with the cession of Louisiana; and another from Mr. Robert Livingston yesterday, saying that Mr. Monroe was gone to London, to reside there as Minister from the United States. In consequence of this, I have again pressed upon this Government a decision with respect to the French captures and condemnations, and have desired an audience on Tuesday.

While I expected Mr. Monroe, and supposed that, in treating respecting Florida, something could have been proposed which might have induced this Government to include our claims for French spoiliations and condemnations, notwithstanding I had, in pursuance of your instructions, brought them forward, I forbore to push them, lest I might injure the other and more important parts of the negotiation; but the moment I received official information from Mr. Monroe and Mr. Livingston that Louisiana was ceded, and that they considered the cession as including West Florida, and that Mr. Monroe was not coming, I then pushed the new propositions respecting our claims, in that positive and decided manner which the circumstances of Europe, and the particular situation of Spain, seemed to me to warrant. In my letter (No. 1) you will perceive the manner in which the new propositions were submitted, and the copy of the new convention; these went in the last despatches. After waiting for some time to see whether Mr. Monroe would arrive with the extraordinary commission, and finding it doubtful, I wrote the letter (No. 2); and immediately on being informed that Mr. Monroe would not come, I demanded an audience of Mr. Cevallos, the Secretary of the Foreign Department, in which I went over the whole ground of our difference in opinion, and repeated to him, at length, not only all the arguments used in my letters, but such others as occurred in the course of conversation, or as I thought the particular and doubtful situation of Spain at present warranted.

* It seems probable that this date, and the following, are advanced, and that this letter was written in July.

I entered fully into the impropriety of Spain's having suffered her ports to be used for the purpose of equipping privateers to cruise upon our vessels, and bringing them in as prizes, and permitting the Consuls of France to condemn them; by which means her territorial sovereignty was not only violated, but her ports, which we ought to have considered not only as the ports of a neutral and a friend, but of a nation in treaty with us, were, by that means, converted into those of an enemy. For what could France do more with her ports against us than equip and man privateers in them, and bring in and condemn our vessels? Spain did not permit us to do so; and if she had offered it, she well knew the offer was of no consequence to us, because the distance from the United States, and the contiguity of the French coasts created a difference in the exercise or use of the permission, which made it extremely important to the one, and of very little consequence to the other. That there can be no doubt that any nation which lends the aid of its ports for the purpose of arming privateers, aids in annoying the commerce of those against which these privateers are intended to cruise; that, further, any nation which vests within its dominions a foreign tribunal, with the power of condemning and selling the property of a neutral nation, assists in depriving the citizens of that nation by force of their property. Hence, it would seem, a permission to arm privateers and sell prizes, granted to one belligerent Power, is inconsistent with the impartiality due to both by a nation which professes to be neutral; that it would not destroy the argument to say the same privileges might be granted to both; that, in our late differences with France, it could not, for the United States never suffered their public or private vessels to capture the merchant ships of France, and, it is believed, in no instance could the privilege operate equally in favor of two nations; from their maritime strength, local situation, or other cause, the one must always benefit by it more than the other; hence, one of them must be materially injured, if it was granted to both. For example: suppose Spain and Russia were engaged in war; would the United States do them equal justice by opening her ports for the arming of their privateers, and the sale of their prizes? Nobody would suppose she did, when he recollected that all, or nearly all, the rich commerce of Spain passes before the ports of the United States, and that Russia has no commerce in that quarter of the world. Again: if unfortunately there was a war between the United States and Spain, would England do equal justice to both, if she opened the port of Gibraltar to both, for the purpose of arming privateers and selling prizes? Certainly not; for, by doing so, she would give to the United States the most advantageous position from whence to annoy the commerce of Spain; and to Spain she would give the use of a port three thousand miles distant from the United States, and not more useful to her than her own on the Mediterranean.

From these and other examples, I endeavored to convince him how peculiarly Spain is situated, and how important it is to her to put an end to a practice so contrary to the principles of justice and strict neutrality. I repeated to him that these observations, together with those which have been, from time to time, during the last four years, offered by my predecessor and myself to the consideration of His Majesty, are believed to be sufficient to entitle us to demand compensation from His Majesty for the property wrested from us by those whose actions he had a right, and most certainly the power, to control; that the respect which the Government of the United States had for His Majesty had induced them to urge the point, which they considered as a point of national honor, with the greatest moderation, as was proved by their offering to refer the question to arbitration, although they were perfectly conscious of their right to demand payment without a reference, of which they had given a proof before they had become interested themselves. But that if Spain will not agree to the principle of neutral right, and chooses to adopt as a part of her public law the practice of opening her ports for the arming of privateers and selling of prizes, I am sure the United States would, in point of mere interest, be benefitted by following the example, after obtaining compensation for the losses they have already sustained.

In order to meet the observations he made before, that His Majesty was not, by the law of nations, liable for the condemnations by the French Consuls, I repeated to him the observations of Vattel, in his 3d book, and particularly in the paragraphs sect. 15, 95, 97, 102, and 104; and endeavored to show him how incompatible these aggressions were with the duties enjoined to neutrals; that, at the time Vattel and others had written on the laws of nations, no such case had occurred; no such new, extraordinary, or unwarrantable attempts had been made to erect, within any country, tribunals independent of its authority. I endeavored to impress upon him the manner in which our Government had defeated a similar attempt upon them at an earlier period of the war, well knowing that, to permit such an exercise of the rights of war within their cities, would be to make their coasts a station of hostility. To show him that we did not stand alone in our opinions on this licentious attempt to exercise the rights of war within neutral countries, where no rights have ever before been exercised, I read and explained to him the doctrines laid down in the English Court of Admiralty, by Sir William Scott, in the celebrated case of the Flad Oyen, Martensen, master; and which, as you have no doubt seen, I shall not trouble you with repeating. I concluded with informing him that our Government considered this as a point of national honor, which they could never relinquish; that, as war had again commenced between Great Britain and France, the decision of Spain on this subject was become now indispensable; that we knew not to what other parts its flames will soon extend; that our commerce must never again be exposed to similar depredations, and that our Government were determined, upon this occasion, to show how far they would protect it; that, having arranged all their differences with France and England, it now rested solely to do so with Spain; that, to do this, they had offered an equal and amicable arbitration, and that I had waited with great patience for their decision; that, however, being now instructed to transmit His Majesty's answer, so that it might be received by the meeting of Congress, the period had arrived when I could delay no longer applying to his Excellency for a prompt and decisive one, which I was hopeful he would give me in a few days, as I had two American gentlemen only waiting to take it to America.

In his answer, he went over the old ground, that Spain, not having authorized, but expressly forbidden, the exercise of this power by the French Consuls, was not, in his opinion, liable to make reparation; that the more he had considered the subject, the more he was convinced; and that, in his view of it, the quotations I had made from Vattel did not apply; that, since the last year, he had been informed, from the best sources, that many leading men in our (the American) Government were in sentiment with him that Spain was not liable; and that even some of our best informed lawyers had given the same opinion. I replied, it was incredible to me that any men of information, whether in our Government or among our gentlemen of the bar, could have given such an opinion; that, if they had, I had never heard of it; that it was always safest for his Excellency to take the sentiments and views of our Government, as they respected Spain, from me; that I could assure him every branch of our Government was not only decided in their opinion as to the liability of His Majesty to make compensation, but determined never to relinquish it, at least so far as to insist upon its being included in the arbitration; that the Senate not having ratified the convention, ought to be full proof of their determination upon this subject; that it was time our Government should know His Majesty's decision, and I must request to have it by the day Mr. Young sailed. He said that was impossible, as the royal feasts, and other occupations of His Majesty, for this month, in which he was obliged to attend him, would put it entirely out of his power; but that he would give it as soon as he could. I then informed him that I considered it as my duty to write, and asked him, "whether I was to transmit to our Executive, as His Majesty's final decision, that he could not consent to include in the convention the captures and condemnations by the French and their Consuls." He hesitated, and said, no. The serious manner in which I put this question seemed to have affected him. He added, "The subject, with your representations, are now before His Majesty, and I will state what has passed further this evening;" at the same time assuring me I should have a very speedy answer. He then went on to converse with me on the subject of the cession of Louisiana by the French to us, in which he expressed an opinion so important and extraordinary, that I made a point of transmitting it to you by the post the next day, by the route of Lisbon, and which, I trust, you will soon receive. The substance was this: that, in the cession of Louisiana by Spain to France, there was a secret article that France should never part with Louisiana, except to Spain; that if she (France) should ever wish to dispose of it, Spain should always have the right of pre-emption; from which he argued that France had not the right to make such cession without the consent of Spain, and that he was astonished our Commissioners had not applied to their Government to know the actual terms upon which France was to receive Louisiana, and, in fact, to examine their title. I answered him by saying, that he could not be more astonished at their not doing so than I was at his remark; that he well knew that Mr. Livingston and myself had been applying for upwards of a year incessantly, to the Governments of France and Spain, to know if Louisiana was ceded, and upon what terms; that, for more than a year, the most guarded silence was observed by both, and that at last, when Spain had answered and avowed the cession, not a word was mentioned in his (Mr. Cevallos's) letter to me of any secret article; that the letter only avowed the cession, and that it had been made subject to the conditions of our treaty; that I had transmitted this to Mr. Livingston and Mr. Monroe; and I asked him whether, after the sight of this letter from him, acknowledging the cession, they could for a moment doubt the perfect right of France to sell. I then further asked him whether, if Spain still continued in possession, and our Government ratified the treaty, there would be any hesitation on the part of His Majesty to give us the possession? To which he made no positive reply, nor could I bring him to do so during the whole evening. I could easily discover, in the course of it, that there exists at present much uneasiness on the part of this Court, with respect to the conduct of France in the sale of Louisiana, and particularly in the opinion held by our Commissioners, that it includes West Florida, which both Mr. Cevallos and the Prince of Peace expressly deny, and on which I write you a separate letter, containing my conversation with them on this subject.

AUGUST 30.

Not receiving the answer of the Secretary as soon as I expected, and anxious to transmit you the result, I followed the Court to San Ildefonso, and had another conference with him on the 24th instant. In this he informed me he was sorry so much delay had been occasioned in his reply; that it was owing to the removal of the Court, and the particular urgency of the moment, alluding I suppose, to the state of things occasioned by the war; that, however, the answer was prepared, and would be transmitted the following day; that I would perceive in it the two grounds upon which His Majesty conceived he was not liable to make compensation for the French condemnations; and that several very respectable and learned gentlemen in the law in the United States had expressed the same opinion, a copy of which he would send me enclosed in his reply. The grounds were: the inability of Spain to prevent it, and the general relinquishment of our claims to France for everything done by Frenchmen, so far as respects the seizure of our vessels or their condemnation; and that he was convinced, when our Government came to see these opinions, and to reconsider the question, they would think, with His Majesty and his Ministers, that Spain was only liable for the acts of her own subjects, except, indeed, in the violation of their territory by foreign cruisers, which, he said, he had no objection to admit, considering it as a distinct question from that of the condemnations. I told him I believed our Government would be not a little surprised to find Spain resorting to the plea that she was not able to prevent it; that, if he pressed this argument, if he contended she was not then a free agent, and, of course, not a responsible one, and could prove it to be so, it only remained for me to transmit this reply to you for your future directions; that the relinquishment he spoke of to France has nothing to do with our claims on Spain: that we never considered ourselves as having any right to demand compensation from France for these violations of the territory and sovereignty of Spain by the cruisers and consuls of France; that they were by no means included in the claims relinquished, but were as distinct and separate as claims could be; that we had received from France a very valuable compensation, in her consent to dissolve the Treaties of Commerce and Alliance previously existing between the two nations—an alliance by which we were bound to guaranty her islands in the West Indies, and to be liberated from which was inestimable to the United States; that from Spain we had hitherto received no compensation, and that it would be found a great part of these claims had originated since the date of the French Convention; that I still hoped he would consent to include them in some way, convinced that, if they were not provided for, our Government would remain extremely dissatisfied; that, merely from motives of conciliation, I would consent to insert them, with the addition of the words he offered the last year, "segun los principios que constituyen la moralidad de las acciones." He said he was rather of opinion, from the intelligence he had received from the United States, that the thing would now be viewed in a different light, and that our Government would not insist on so hard terms, even if they had the right, as to call upon them for condemnations which they could not prevent, and not one shilling of the proceeds of which went into the pockets of His Majesty or his subjects; that he never meant, the last year, in what he said respecting the arbitration, subject to the limitation of "segun los principios, &c.," to apply it to the condemnations of the French consuls, or to have left it to the Commissioners to decide upon them, but only to the violations of territory; and that, had I admitted the limitation, he would have expressly excepted the condemnations; that for the acts of his own subjects and the violations of territory by foreign cruisers, His Majesty had always been ready to arbitrate, as appeared by his letters to me of the last year; that he wished me to transmit the reply he would send me, with the opinions of the American lawyers on the subject; and that he did not doubt their future instructions to me would be such as would tend to promote the harmony and good understanding of the two Governments.

On the morning following, he sent me the enclosed answer to my several verbal and written applications, accompanied by an opinion, which I also enclose, given by Messrs. Ingersoll, Rawle, McKean, Duponceau, and Livingston, on an abstract question submitted to them, as I suppose, by the order of this Government. I considered it proper to transmit Mr. Cevallos an answer, in which you will find most of the arguments insisted upon which had been before used, and in which I object to the statement submitted to our lawyers, as not expressing either fully or truly the state of facts; that, in relinquishing our claims on France, we had done so for a valuable consideration, and that, in so doing, we had by no means relinquished our claims on Spain, as they were separate and distinct; that, for the truth of this, we referred him to the letters of my predecessor, by which it appears the Government of Spain were continually warned of the illegality of the captures and condemnations, and informed that His Majesty would be held liable to make compensation; that, in resorting to the plea that Spain could not prevent it, it was incumbent on her to show that she really could not, either by force or influence, do so, and that she had exerted herself, as far as she was able, to effect it; that, after all, if it was true she could not prevent it, but to avoid a war, or a renewal of the war with France, was under the necessity of submitting to it, and of sacrificing to the preservation of peace the commerce and property of the citizens of the United States, on every principle of justice and national honor she ought now to make a compensation; that the tacit sacrifice of the property of our citizens was the price she paid for a peace, inestimable to her in every respect; and that, in my judgment, she ought now most cheerfully and gratefully to submit to our proposition for an arbitration, rejoicing that we have been so moderate as to acquiesce in this mode, and not to demand, not only immediate compensation for the losses, but satisfaction for the injury to our national honor; that it should be recollected the opinions of gentlemen of the law, however respectable as professional men, were not to direct our Government; that they were supposed to be the best judges of our public rights, and had alone the authority to treat respecting them, and, when necessary, to devise the means of asserting and protecting them; and that even the opinions he produced could easily be proved to be in our favor.

As I cannot now expect that Spain will agree to include the claims for the condemnations by the French Consuls, it will remain for you to direct what is best to be done. You will consider how far her plea that she could not prevent it entitles her to consideration, and whether it appears, in any of our applications to the French Government previously to the signing of the Convention of 1800, we applied to them for compensation for the captures and condemnations by the French privateers and Consuls within the territory of Spain, or included them in those claims which were afterwards relinquished. In determining this, much will depend upon the correspondence of our Envoys or Commissioners who made the Convention with the French Envoys, and I will thank you for the necessary information, and copies of such of his letters respecting the claims as may be proper.

From the above you will see the state of the negotiation, and with what anxiety this Government wish to avoid inserting the claims for the condemnations by the French. I have no doubt Mr. Yrujo has been very industrious on this subject in the United States, and Mr. Azzara in Paris, in endeavoring to collect all the intelligence they can, to prove that we considered these as claims on France; that our commissioners had urged them as such; and that they are included in the general relinquishment to that nation. As I do not believe this to have been the case, I have continued to urge them as separate claims, which could be alone made on this Government; and you will perceive, by my letter to Mr. Cevallos, that I do not by any means agree with him, or acquiesce in his doctrines. Upon the whole of this business, it appears to me, that, in the present state of Europe, it would be politic in us to endeavor to arrange all the claims on Spain, by conditionally ratifying the convention already sent, striking out the sixth article, and inserting one including such of the claims for French captures and condemnations as you are determined to insist upon, and accompanying it with a specific offer to Spain to purchase Florida, or such part of it as now remains to her; for, on the subject of the limits of Louisiana and Florida, I am otherwise apprehensive we may have some difficulties. Mr. Livingston and Mr. Monroe officially informed me they considered West Florida as included in the cession. This the Prince of Peace and Mr. Cevallos strongly deny; and, unless we can come to some agreement with Spain for the cession of all their claims on Florida, we may, as I have observed, have some difficulties with them. This appears to me, also, to be the best time; for Spain must eventually be involved in the war; and, cut off from her resources in South America, her trade destroyed, and her people without bread, a sum of money would go a great way in tempting her to sell. We are now, also, sure of the influence and assistance of France in persuading them to do so; for General Bournonville, the French Ambassador, told me lately he had received orders from his Government to promote, as far as he could, a disposition in this Court to sell Florida to the United States. Notwithstanding Mr. Monroe has not come on, I am continually conversing with the leading men here on this subject, and keeping it constantly in their view; but, not conceiving myself now authorized to make any explicit offer, and not knowing exactly what proportion of West Florida you will insist upon as ceded to the United States by France, I wait your further instructions, which I request may be as particular and as explicit as possible; not wishing, in affairs of so great pecuniary importance, to have too much left to my discretion. I take the liberty to recommend the bearer, Mr. Young, to the President and yourself, as an excellent and deserving public officer. Please present me in the most respectful and affectionate manner to the President, and believe me, with sincere regard and affectionate respect, dear sir, yours truly,

CHARLES PINCKNEY.

Mr. Pinckney to Mr. Cevallos.

MADRID, May 23, 1803.

I have the honor to inform your Excellency, that, after the most mature reflection and deliberation, the Government of the United States are of opinion they cannot, consistently with the honor of their Government, or those interests of its citizens which it is their duty to support, consent to any convention with His Majesty for the arbitration in settlement of their respective claims, which shall not include the arbitration of all the claims arising, as well from the acts of Spanish subjects, as those of aliens or foreigners within the Spanish territory, contrary to the laws of nations, or the treaty existing between His Majesty and the United States, and that, in order to allow time for including this class of claims, they have postponed coming to any decision on the convention formed between your Excellency and myself, until the next session of the Senate, in November. In consequence, therefore, of their precise and positive instructions, I now submit a new convention which they expect His Majesty will consent your Excellency should sign, for the following reasons: That your Excellency has already agreed to arbitrate all the acts of Spanish subjects, contrary to the treaty and the law of nations, and all the infractions of the Spanish territory by foreign privateers; and, in your Excellency's letter of the 26th June, did positively agree to insert all the other claims arising from the acts of aliens, if I would consent to insert after the words "ó de otros," the words "cuyos excesos puedan imputarse al Gobierno Español según los principios que constituyen la moralidad de las acciones y su responsabilidad."

As it was unusual to insert expressions of this kind, and I did not conceive my instructions as warranting it, I objected at that time to the insertion, and preferred trying the opinion of our Government on a Convention confined solely to the acts of Spanish subjects, and leaving the question respecting those of aliens to future negotiation. It is, however, the opinion of our Government that, when the two Governments go to the expense and trouble of constituting this Board, it ought at once to be authorized to consider and decide upon all their mutual claims.

From the dispositions, or rather assent, at first manifested by your Excellency, and on perusal of your letters, a more favorable as well as speedy issue was expected to this negotiation by our Government, and it is still hoped and expected that modifications may be devised that will make the contested article satisfactory to Spain, without being unjust to the United States.

The true object is to give to the board a power that will reach every description of cases. According to information received from time to time, it appears that losses have been sustained by citizens of the United States: first, on the high seas; secondly, within the territorial jurisdiction of Spain herself; thirdly, within the jurisdiction of her colonies: that they have proceeded, first, to the Treaty of 1795; or, secondly, to the law of nations; or, thirdly, to substantial justice. It is desirable, therefore, that a stipulated provision for repairing these injuries should be so expressed as to be commensurate with this view of the cases; or, if this extent cannot be explicitly given to the provision, that it should be as little narrowed as possible.

The objection made to giving the board cognizance of the wrongs committed by aliens within the jurisdiction, and, consequently, within the temporary allegiance of the King of Spain, is clearly open to the reply I made to it. The authority which every Sovereign has over the conduct of aliens within his territorial jurisdiction, makes him responsible to others for their conduct, as much, and for the same reason, as he is responsible for the conduct of permanent citizens or subjects. This is a doctrine too well established, both by reason and by public law, to be questioned. The United States have pursued it in practice, as well as in discussion; and may, therefore, with the more energy, claim the benefit of it. The remark of your Excellency, that the stipulation on this subject, in our Treaty of 1794 with Great Britain implies that, without such a stipulation, the law of nations would not have imposed on the United States the responsibility assumed, admits of a double answer. The United States acquiesced in the doctrine before the Treaty was made; and the stipulation in the Treaty, like numerous stipulations in other treaties, was not meant to supersede the rule of public law, but to acknowledge and explain it.

It is not denied that there are certain exceptions to the authority over those within a temporary, which do not apply to the authority over those within a permanent allegiance; and so far there may be exceptions to the responsibility of the Sovereign also. But none of these exceptions belong to the cases in question. In the equipment of privateers, and the condemnation of prizes in Spanish ports, the King of Spain had the same authority to restrain aliens as he had to restrain his own subjects from illegal acts towards other nations. Having this authority, his duty to other nations required him to exert it; and, failing in this duty, he made himself answerable to those injured by the failure.

The losses sustained by Americans from aliens, and for which Spain is held answerable, have proceeded, first, from condemnations within her jurisdiction known to be against the American trade; thirdly, from equipments ostensibly made against the enemies of Spain, but turned against the United States; fourthly, from captures only within the limits of Spanish jurisdiction.

With respect to the first two cases, it is clear that the Spanish Government had not only the right but the power to interpose effectually; and is, consequently, bound to repair the consequences of her omission. With respect to the fourth case, the violations of her territory might be less under her control, where the prizes were not carried into her ports. Still, however, with the right accruing to her against the aggressors, accrues, at the same time, the right against her to the sufferer.

It is my duty to inform your Excellency, and my instructions direct me to do so, that the course pursued by the Senate of the United States, in postponing the decision on the convention until the next session, in order that His Majesty should have time to consent to incorporate and include the arbitration of the claims arising from acts of aliens within the Spanish territories, while it maintains a cautious regard for our own rights, exhibits, at the same time great respect for the Spanish Government. Every branch of our Government is of opinion that the arbitration of these claims ought to be included, and that, by the law of nations, Spain is clearly answerable for the acts of aliens within her territory and jurisdiction; and, notwithstanding the time which has already been spent, and the ruinous delays which have taken place, they still rely on the well known honor of His Majesty, to remodel the convention, so as to do ample justice.

But, in order to remove all doubt on the subject, and to show how well founded is the right the United States have to expect that this class of claims will be admitted at least to arbitration, I am also directed to refer your Excellency to the enclosed copy of a royal order, issued by the Spanish Government in 1799, which must remind your Excellency of the view of your Government, and of their opinions at that time on this subject. In this document it is expressly declared, that the French Consular jurisdiction was not admitted in Spain, and that French Consuls in Spanish ports were, and always have been, in the same condition only with those of every other nation.

After such a declaration against the authority of French Consuls, the Spanish Government never can say, nor have they ever said, they were not left at liberty to prevent an exercise of the usurped authority; and, if at liberty, she is indisputably answerable for the consequences of not preventing it. A document which I also take the liberty to add, will explain the just sentiments entertained by the Batavian Government during the same period in relation to a case turning on the same principle.

This subject has been so often and so long before your Excellency, that it is not necessary for me to go again into the other arguments heretofore used to prove to your Excellency the policy and justice of the measure. Our Government relies confidently on the justice and honor of His Majesty, and on the promise contained in your letters, and particularly that of the 26th June last, in which you say you consent to the inclusion of the words "de otros," and in the arbitration of claims for damages arising from the acts of aliens, with the addition of this comment, for its clear signification: "o de otros cuyos excesos puedan imputarse al Gobierno Español segun los principios que constituyen la moralidad de las acciones y su responsabilidad." The present convention is drawn in conformity with that limitation, with some few alterations of no moment, which our Government wishes for the more convenient caption, in which, instead of the words "excesses," &c., I have substituted "in consequence of the wrongs committed by the subjects or citizens of either nation, or under color of authority from it, or by others within the territory of either nation." An alteration in the mode of filling up vacancies in the commission, should a vacancy occur after formation of the Board, as it would prevent their going on, and be extremely inconvenient and expensive to wait the nomination from the United States of an American commissioner to fill a vacancy, which would now be the case. An article also is added to equalise the payment of the commissioners, and to provide for the payment of the expenses of the Board. We wish, also, the Board to be vested with power to extend the time, if they think proper, in special cases, six months longer, so as not to exceed, in the whole, two years.

Your Excellency will find the whole substantially the same as the last, except with the addition to the claims for the acts of aliens, and I am particularly enjoined by my Government to request as early a decision as possible. Should your Excellency not approve the form exactly as it is now sent, I will then thank your Excellency to be so obliging as to favor me with one which you will sign; it being, however, necessary for me to state to your Excellency that I do not consider myself as now at liberty to assent to any that shall not include the arbitration of the claims arising from the acts of aliens in the territories of each.

I repeat to your Excellency my earnest request that you will be pleased to furnish me with your definitive answer for the information of my Government as early as possible, as I am particularly directed by them to endeavor to obtain and transmit it, with all the despatch in my power,

With sentiments of the most profound respect,
I have the honor to be your Excellency's obedient, humble servant, CHAS. PINCKNEY

DON PEDRO CEVALLOS.

[Draught of the proposed convention referred to in Mr. Pinckney's letter to Mr. Cevallos, of May 23, 1803.]

A Convention between His Catholic Majesty and the United States of America, for the indemnification of those who have sustained losses, damages, or injuries, in consequence of the wrongs committed by the subjects or citizens of either nation, or under color of authority from it, or by others, within the territory of either nation, during the late war, contrary to the existing treaty or the laws of nations.

His Catholic Majesty and the Government of the United States of America, wishing amicably to adjust the claims which have arisen in consequence of the wrongs committed by the subjects or citizens of either nation, or under color of authority from it, or by others within the territory of either nation; during the late war, contrary to the existing treaty or the law of nations; His Catholic Majesty has given, for this purpose, full powers to his Excellency Don Pedro Cevallos Councillor of State, Gentleman of the Bedchamber in employment, First Secretary of State and Universal Despatch, Grand Cross of the Royal and Distinguished Order of Charles the Third, and Superintendent General of the Posts and Post Offices in Spain and the Indies; and the Government of the United States of America to Charles Pinckney, a citizen of the said States, and their Minister Plenipotentiary near His Catholic Majesty; who have agreed as follows:

1. A Board of Commissioners shall be formed, composed of five commissioners, two of whom shall be appointed by His Catholic Majesty, two others by the Government of the United States, and the fifth by common consent. And in case they should not be able to agree on a person for the fifth commissioner, each party shall name one, and leave the decision to lot. And, hereafter, in case of death, sickness, or necessary absence of any of those already appointed, the remaining commissioner or commissioners of the nation to which the commissioner so dead, sick, or necessarily absent belonged, shall be authorized to proceed to the appointment of another to replace him; and the new commissioner shall take the same oath or affirmation, and do the same duties. And it is agreed that the commissioners shall be respectively paid in such manner as shall be agreed between the two parties—such agreement being to be settled at the time of the ratifications of this convention. And all other expenses attending the said commissioners shall be defrayed jointly by the two parties—the same being previously ascertained and allowed by the majority of the commissioners.

2. The appointment of the commissioners being thus made, each one of them shall take an oath to examine, discuss, and decide on the claims which they are to judge, according to the law of nations and the existing treaty, and with the impartiality justice may dictate, and not to act directly or indirectly in any case in which they are directly or indirectly interested.

3. The commissioners shall meet and hold their sessions in Madrid, where, within the term of eighteen months, or in special cases, at the discretion of the board, two years, (to be reckoned from the day on which they may assemble,) they shall receive all claims which in consequence of this convention may be made, as well by the subjects of His Catholic Majesty as by citizens of the United States of America, who may have a right to demand compensation for the losses, damages, or injuries sustained by them in consequence of the wrongs committed by the subjects or citizens of either nation, or under color of authority from it, or by others, within the territory of either nation, during the late war, contrary to the existing treaty or the law of nations.

4. The commissioners are authorized by the said contracting parties to hear and examine, on oath, every question relative to the said demands, and to receive as worthy of credit all testimony or evidence, the authenticity of which cannot reasonably be doubted.

5. From the decisions of the commissioners there shall be no appeal; and the agreement of three of them shall give full force and effect to their decisions, as well with respect to the justice of the claims as to the amount of indemnification which may be adjudged to the claimants—the said contracting parties obliging to satisfy the said awards in specie, without deduction, at the times and places pointed out, and under the conditions which may be expressed by the Board of Commissioners.

6. The present convention shall have no force or effect until it be ratified by the contracting parties.

In faith whereof, we, the underwritten Plenipotentiaries, have signed this convention, and have affixed thereunto our respective seals.

Done at Madrid, this — day of —.

Mr. Pinckney to Mr. Cevallos.

I have waited for some considerable time, to have the favor of your Excellency's reply to the representations I had the honor to make, in conformity to the orders of my Government, on the subject of the claims for captures and condemnations. I was hopeful the respectful manner in which our Government had treated the subject, by postponing their final decision until His Majesty could have time to decide on the propriety of admitting the arbitration of the claims for captures of our vessels by the French, within the territory of Spain, and condemnations in their ports, and the arguments adduced in support of the justice and equity of the arbitration proposed, would have long since convinced your Excellency of the propriety of acceding to our proposition; and I am induced to flatter myself your Excellency will still do so. In referring to the arguments which have been already so often and so much at length adduced in support of our claims, I shall now only say that our Government, on a candid and deliberate review of the subject, are convinced that they never can, in honor to their nation, or in justice to its citizens, totally relinquish these claims; that they have again charged me, in the most positive terms, to request a definite and speedy answer from His Majesty. They well know that, according to substantial justice and the law of nations, they are warranted in demanding payment for all the vessels so illegally captured or condemned by the French; but, in that spirit of friendship and forbearance which has always governed their councils, and particularly as they respect His Catholic Majesty, they have forbore to make the demand for payment in the first instance, and have only asked for an equal and fair arbitration, which it appears to me, on maturely considering the subject, his Majesty will not refuse.

When two nations differ on a point like this—each equally entitled to form its own opinion, and sufficiently powerful to assert its honor and protect its rights, and each seriously determined not to relinquish them—there are no modes of terminating the difference but those of war or arbitration. Our Government, while seriously determined never to relinquish their claims, have long and amicably proposed the latter. They have again charged me to call for a definitive answer, in order that His Majesty's determination may be known before the next meeting of the Congress. I do, therefore, again most earnestly request of your Excellency to favor me with a reply to the propositions I made for a new convention, and with the form of such a one as your Excellency will approve, and of the terms on which you will consent to arbitrate the French captures and condemnations.

It is now uncertain whether Mr. Monroe will come on with the new commission extraordinary from our Government directed to him and myself at all, or if he should bring it, when; but if he does, its objects are entirely distinct from these claims—the urging the definitive answer to which my Government has again pressed on me in so serious a manner, that I am confident your Excellency will have the goodness to favor me with as early a reply as possible.

I avail myself, with pleasure, on this occasion, to offer to your Excellency the homage of the high respect and perfect consideration with which I have the honor to be your Excellency's most obedient humble servant.

C PINCKNEY.

DON PEDRO CEVALLOS.

Relations with Spain.

Mr. Pinckney to Mr. Cevallos.

MADRID, July 15, 1803.

Before your Excellency gives the definitive answer to the propositions made to you by order of my Government—that answer which is probably to determine the relation hereafter to subsist between the two countries—I once more take the liberty of requesting you to reconsider the arguments that have been before used, and the extremely mild and moderate terms I have offered of only arbitrating claims which the laws of nature and nations, as well as those of honor and justice, give us a right to demand compensation for, and that without reference.

Your Excellency having fully conceded the point, that the French Consuls had no right to exercise the power of condemning vessels in Spanish ports, I shall not trouble you with arguments on that subject; but when your Excellency goes on to say that His Majesty, in having forbidden the exercise of this power by them, had done all that could be expected from him, and that he was not liable by the law of nations for the condemnations and sales made by the said Consuls of American vessels and cargoes, either before or after his prohibition, I not only differ with your Excellency, but assert that, by the law of nations, His Majesty is expressly liable for every condemnation and sale which the Consuls were permitted to make in his dominions.

I presume your Excellency will not deny that the authority which His Majesty has over the conduct of aliens within his territorial jurisdiction, makes him responsible to others for their conduct, as much, and for the same reasons, that he is responsible for the conduct of permanent citizens or subjects.

Your Excellency will also allow that, unless otherwise specially provided for by treaty, according to the law of nations, the French Consuls could only exercise the powers therein defined, and that the moment they stepped beyond them, and particularly to the injury of innocent aliens, trading under the sanction of a solemn treaty, it became a duty on His Majesty, not only to forbid the exercise of this unwarrantable and injurious power, but to see that his order was fully carried into effect. To merely issue an order to prohibit it, and not to see it carried into execution, is to do nothing; it operates as a delusion, because, by issuing the prohibition, you hold out an opinion to foreigners that no such authority exists, while in fact it is suffered to be executed to an extent and with a rigor never before heard of. Your Excellency will not say Spain had not the power to prevent its exercise, because we well know she had, and the honor of her Government will not permit her for a moment to resort to this argument. She received the French Consuls only on the footing of other Consuls, and with the same privileges and powers, as she has expressly declared. If they exceeded these, to the injury of innocent neutrals, and, after being forbidden by His Majesty still continued to do so, I presume the necessary means should have been used to prevent them. As these means were not used, and as Spain permitted them to continue the exercise of this unheard-of authority while she had the power to prevent it, and ought to have done so, according to that principle of the law of nations which declares that "qui non prohibet quando prohibere possit jubet," His Majesty is to be considered as much liable, in every respect, for these condemnations and violations of territory, as if they had been done by his own subjects, or by his own express authority.

In the equipment of privateers, and the condemnation of prizes in Spanish ports, His Majesty most surely had the same authority to restrain aliens as he had to restrain his own subjects from illegal acts towards other nations. Having this authority, his duty to other nations required him to exert it; and, failing in this duty, I am charged by my Government to repeat it to your Excellency, as their decided opinion, that His Majesty has made himself liable to make reparation.

I beg leave to refer your Excellency to the general representation made by my predecessor on this subject, on the 24th of January, 1800, and to those made by myself since my arrival, and to the rules established by Vattel, b. 3, §15, 95, 97, 102, and 104, which show how incompatible these aggressions are with the regulations prescribed by the law of nations for the government of neutral countries. I shall only add, that the United States consider this question as a point of national honor which it is impossible for them to relinquish; and I can assure your Excellency, with great truth, and I am charged to do so, that it is one on which every branch of our Government is decided and unanimous; that having before refused to relinquish points of national honor, either to Great Britain or to France, they are determined not to do so to Spain; convinced that, if they did, they would have soon to meet similar questions with other countries; but that, having proved, as it is their duty to do now, that our rights must be respected, we shall then have some reason to hope they will remain in future unassailed.

The arbitration of the claims for illegal captures and condemnations by the French and their Consuls, however interesting before, has become now, not only extremely important, but absolutely indispensable. War has again commenced between Great Britain and France; we know not to what other parts of Europe its flames will extend; the American commerce must never again be exposed to similar depredations, and their Government must, upon this occasion, show how far they are determined to protect it. Having arranged all their differences with Great Britain and France, it now rests solely to do so with Spain; to effect this, they have offered an equal and amicable arbitration. Your Excellency will do me the justice to say, I have proposed and endeavored to accomplish this with all the calmness and moderation in my power, and perhaps, with more patience than the nature and circumstances of the case warranted. It arose from the friendship I knew my Government had for Spain, and my earnest wish to preserve the peace of the two countries. The period has now arrived when my instructions require me to delay no longer, but to apply to your Excellency for a prompt and decisive answer. I made this application to your Excellency verbally yesterday, and I now repeat it in writing, and I earnestly hope it may be such a one as it will give me pleasure to transmit.

If your Excellency could send me such definitive answer by the 20th instant, I will be obliged, as the American Consul for Madrid leaves this on the 22d for the United States.

With sentiments of the most profound respect and perfect consideration, I have the honor, &c.

CHARLES PINCKNEY.

Don PEDRO CEVALLOS.

First Sec'y of State, &c.

Mr. Cevallos to Mr. Pinckney.

St. ILDEFONSO, Aug. 23, 1803.

SIR: In the project of a convention or treaty relative to indemnities, which I transmitted to you by order of the King, His Majesty yielded to all the condescensions with which he was inspired by his constant desire to maintain the best understanding and the most perfect harmony with the United States; but you have, nevertheless, thought it your duty to claim and insist that Spain ought to acknowledge herself responsible for all the injuries which the French privateers have occasioned to the citizens of the United States, by violating the Spanish territory.

It is, however, very easy for me to evince, and fully prove, that such a claim is incompatible with the law of nations; that the examples which may be cited in support of it, having been produced by political circumstances of the moment, ought not to be considered as serving for a rule, much less can they alter the invariable principles of natural law; and that as little is such a pretension conformable with the particular relations and ties by which the two nations are bound, in virtue of the Treaty of 1795. But I think it useless to enter into a detailed discussion upon these points, as well because nothing which can be said would be unknown to you, as because, on various occasions, we have sufficiently discussed them, and also because Spain can impugn this pretension on principles which are special, and peculiarly relative to the case in question.

If by the captures which the French cruisers have made of American vessels and cargoes, by violating the Spanish territory, any obligation to pay indemnities could have fallen upon Spain, it never could have been more than an accessory and conditional obligation, and of the same nature with bail, a mortgage, or pledge, whose force is dissolved as soon as the principal debtor complies with his obligation, or is released by the creditor; the latter renouncing his right. This being indubitable, it is not less so that the United States, having renounced, by the solemnity of a convention in favor of France, the principal debtor, the right which they had to claim indemnities for the losses referred to, the obligation of Spain, who, at most, could only be considered as hypothetically responsible, must be dissolved.

That the United States have renounced, in favor of France, the right which they might have to demand indemnities for the losses which they have sustained from the French cruisers, is a fact beyond all doubt, since the convention concluded between the two Powers on the 7th Vendemiaire, ninth year, the second article of which is as follows: "The Ministers Plenipotentiary of the two parties not being able at present to agree relative to the Treaty of Alliance of the 6th February, 1778, to the Treaty of Amity and Commerce of the same date, and to the convention of the 14th November, 1778, nor relative to the indemnities mutually due and claimed, the parties will hereafter negotiate upon these subjects at a convenient time; and, until they shall be agreed upon this point, the said treaties and convention shall have no effect." Secondly, the said convention was presented to the Senate of the United States for their ratification. The Senate, perhaps, with a view to shut the door against France, in order that the treaties cited in the second article might not be renewed, was not pleased to ratify it without the total suppression of the second article; and, this suppression being made, it ratified it. The French Government, being informed of this, ratified it, on their part, in the following terms: "The Consuls of the Republic, having seen and examined the convention concluded, agreed upon, and signed at Paris, on the 8th Vendemiaire, ninth year of the Republic, approve it in all and every of the articles therein contained, declare that it is accepted, &c. The Government of the United States having added in its ratification that the convention shall be in force during the space of eight years, and having omitted the second article, the Government of the French Republic consents to accept, ratify, and confirm the above convention, with the addition which declares that the convention shall be in force during the space of eight years, and with the retrenchment of the second article: Provided, That, by this retrenchment, the two States renounce the respective pretensions which are the object of the said article." This stipulation having been agreed to by the Government of the United States, it results, as a consequence, that it has renounced forever the right to claim indemnities from the French Government for the aforesaid damages; and thus it was reported, in the present year, to the House of Representatives of the United States, by the committee appointed to consider the petitions presented to Congress by sundry merchants who suffered by the depredations of the French.

In our last conference, you seemed sensible of the weight of this reply; but (doubtless in order that, from your zeal for the defence of the interests confided to you, the smallest scruple might not remain of your not having attempted all the means suggested by your political skill,) you endeavored to impugn it, by striving to lay upon Spain the principal obligation and responsibility for the losses which, near her coasts, or in her ports, the French privateers and tribunals have occasioned to citizens of the United States. But to satisfy this reply, and to evince that the principal obligation can remain only with France, it will be sufficient merely to examine the course which the citizens injured have pursued in their claims, and in the application they have made to Congress, whereby they acknowledged that, by the renunciation which their Government made to France, they were deprived of the right of making a claim anywhere but at home; but I will, nevertheless, add another reflection, which is, that, whether France is alone responsible for the injuries done by privateers, or Spain and France jointly, if you choose to suppose it, the obligation is one, sole, and indivisible, and dissolved by the renunciation of the United States in favor of France; and thus fails the supposition necessary for their claim against Spain.

Although what I have remarked to you is of such intrinsic force that it needs no other support to arrest conviction, I cannot omit adding to you, in confirmation of the same, that the most esteemed lawyers of the United States, some of whom hold offices under the Federal Government, having had the same question which we are discussing presented to them, with only a concealment of the names of the three Powers, Spain, France, and the United States, and a substitution in their place of the first three letters of the alphabet to indicate them, have given their opinion uniformly that Spain is under no obligation to satisfy the indemnities referred to, on the supposition of the renunciation in favor of France. Annexed, I enclose to you literal copies of the question proposed to the said lawyers, who are among the most esteemed of Philadelphia and New York, and of their answers, the original of which is in my hands. By them you will see that the Government of Spain, in judging that it is not responsible for the said indemnities, judges as do the learned in highest repute in the United States; and that, in having endeavored to consult their opinion, it cannot be argued that they procured opinions partial to the interests of Spain. It has rather obtained, from the rectitude of the said learned, a sincere confession of the slender foundation on which the claims of their own country on this subject rest.

I conclude, by assuring you I should be glad if the request of the United States were of such a nature that my Government could accede to it, in order to manifest to you equally on this occasion that the cabinet of Spain does not depart from the system of generosity and condescension with which she has always acted in whatever relates to the United States; and I improve, with pleasure, this occasion to repeat to you my desires to please you, and that our Lord would guard you many years, &c.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

CHARLES PINCKNEY, Esq.

Abstract Questions.

The Power A lives in perfect harmony and friendship with Power B. The Power C, either with reason or without, commits hostilities against the subjects of the Power B, takes some of their vessels, carries them into the ports of A, friend of both, where they are condemned and sold by the official agents of Power C, without Power A, being able to prevent it. At last a treaty is entered into, by which the Powers B and C adjust their differences, and in this treaty the Power B, renounces and abandons to Power C, the right to any claim for the injuries and losses occasioned to its subjects by the hostilities from Power C.

Quere. Has the Power B, any right to call upon Power A for indemnities for the losses occasioned in its ports and coasts to its subjects by those of Power C, after the Power B has abandoned or relinquished, by its treaty with C, its rights for the damages which could be claimed for the injuries sustained from the hostile conduct of Power C?

Answer. We have considered the above case, and are of opinion that, on the general principles of the law of nations, the Power A is not liable to the Power B for acts done upon the vessels belonging to the subjects of Power B, by the Power C, within the ports of A, the latter not being able to prevent it. Nations are not, any more than individuals, bound to perform impossibilities.

But even leaving impossibilities out the question, and admitting that the Power A could have prevented the injury which was committed by the Power C, but refused or neglected to do it, we are of opinion that, if the Power B has relinquished the same injury to Power C, in that case the Power A is no longer liable to any responsibility in damages on account of its acquiescence.

1st. Because it appears to us that, in the present case, the Power C is to be considered as the principal party, and the Power A merely as an accessory, and that it is in that relation to each other that their several acts and their respective liability to the injured party is to be considered: now, it is in the nature of all accessory things that they cannot subsist without the principal thing; and the principal trespass being done away by the release to C, the accessory offence of A must be done away likewise, according to the well known maxim of the law accessorium sequitur principale.

2d. Because a release or relinquishment of a right implies in law the receipt of satisfaction, and it is contrary to every principle of jurisprudence for a party to receive a double satisfaction for the same injury; and here the injury received by B from C and from A is essentially the same: the act of those two Powers were indeed different, but the effect which they produced was the same, and that effect only can be the object of compensation in damages.

3d. Because if the Power A could be compelled to make satisfaction to Power B for the injury which the latter has released or relinquished to C, that release or relinquishment would be defeated to every useful purpose, as the Power C would be liable to the Power A for the same damages from which it was intended to be discharged by the release of B. Now a release, as well as every other contract or engagement, implies that nothing shall be done by the grantor directly or indirectly to defeat its bona fide intent or effect. If, therefore, the claim preferred by B upon A will, if admitted, indirectly defeat the release granted to C, such claim must be pronounced to be illegal.

Upon the whole, we are of opinion that the release granted by the Power B to the Power C operates also a release to the Power A, for its participation in the injury which was the object of that release.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 15, 1802.

Answer of the Attorney General of the District of New York to the same question.

According to the above statement, I should have no doubt that B, having abandoned its rights to indemnity against C, would have no claim whatever against A, more especially as the case supposes it out of the power of A to have prevented the transaction.

EDW. LIVINGSTON.

NEW YORK, Nov. 3, 1802.

Mr. Pinckney to Mr. Cevallos.

MADRID, August 28, 1803.

I feel it my duty to reply to your Excellency's letter of the 23d instant, which was handed to me a few days ago at the Royal Sitio of San Ildefonso, the more especially as your Excellency seems now somewhat to have changed the grounds of your defence. Formerly, I thought that the question between us rested upon the law of nations, and to that point I directed my arguments; but now, your Excellency says, 1st, That we have received compensation; and 2d, (if I understand the application of the abstract question,) That Spain was not able to prevent the injuries we suffered in her ports, from the citizens or subjects of a foreign nation. Before I enter into the discussion of these new topics, I must be permitted to observe, that they appear to me somewhat inconsistent with the first position taken by your Excellency; for, if we have received compensation, it is a simple matter of fact, and at once does away the necessity of resorting to general principles, which are, unfortunately, but too apt to be misunderstood or misapplied even by those whose intentions are perfectly upright; on the contrary, if these were so evidently against us, as your Excellency is pleased to say they are, I am surprised that a resort should be had to the confession that Spain was not the mistress of her ports. The tendency of these observations, and of others which might be drawn from the same source, (but that I do not wish to dilate upon the subject,) is to produce a conviction in my mind, either that your Excellency apprehends that our claims cannot be resisted upon the general principles of the laws of nations, or that it will, on some future occasion, be injurious to Spain to admit this doctrine. If

I am mistaken, your Excellency will, I hope, do me the honor to favor me with arguments to show the application of general principles against us. Until then I shall look upon this ground as abandoned, and endeavor to prove to your Excellency that we did not, by rejecting the second article of the convention with France, relinquish our claim against Spain. It is admitted that, by this rejection, "the two States renounce the respective pretensions which are the object of the said article." Now these were (so far as relates to the present discussion) the indemnities mutually due and claimed. The question, then is, what were the indemnities mutually due and claimed? To decide upon this, we are again brought back to the general principles; and until it is shown, by the application of these, that our claim upon Spain is unfounded, it cannot be said that we have received compensation from France. The abstract question submitted to the learned gentlemen from Philadelphia and New York does not fit the present case, as, in the statement made to them, it is affirmed that the Power B renounces and abandons to Power C the right of any claim for the injuries and losses occasioned to its subjects by the hostilities from Power C. Now this is taking for granted the very thing to be proved, and consequently, any deductions drawn from such premises are inadmissible: the question ought to have been, did the Power A violate the laws of nations, by suffering the Power C to make free use of her ports in arming privateers to cruise against the vessels of Power B, and also, by suffering her to establish in the same courts for condemning and selling the said vessels when brought in as prizes? And if this is a violation of the law of nations, whether is the Power B to seek redress from Power C or the Power A? Your Excellency must admit that this is the simple question stripped of any extraneous matter; and if it is determined that the Power B has its resource against the Power A, then no subsequent arrangement with the Power C can affect this claim, unless it expressly includes it. Does, then, the arrangement between France and the United States express the relinquishment of any claims which the latter may have upon Spain? It certainly does not, for Spain is not mentioned in this arrangement. Hence it follows, that if our claim against Spain is supported by the law of nations, or the principles of justice, it cannot be vitiated by our convention with France. Your Excellency well knows that the practice of our Government, and the reclamations of my predecessor, show that we held Spain liable for the injuries we received in her ports; and this clearly proves that, by ratifying the convention with France, we meant not to relinquish our claims upon Spain; and I must suppose that your Excellency did not, until very lately, think we had done it, as I do not remember that you ever before advanced the opinion; and certainly, if it was well founded, there could not be a stronger argument against us, and I am sure it is one which would not have escaped the enlightened mind of your Excellency. There is another inaccuracy, as it applies to the present case, in the abstract question alluded to above, for it turns principally upon the inability of the Power A to prevent, within its ports, the aggressions of the Power C. This I presume could not have been the case with Spain, and the circumstance of an Algerine vessel being delivered up in Cadiz proves that it was not; but at all events, whatever might have been the inability of Spain, it was incumbent on her to make an effort proportionate to the object, and, if she then failed, her moral obligation ceased; but if, for wise and prudential considerations best known to herself, she chose not to make this effort, but rather to suffer the property of her friends to be sacrificed in her ports, this was the price which she paid for peace, and to those at whose expense the payment was made, she is certainly bound in honor to make compensation. We admitted this reasoning when it operated against ourselves; for we paid the British for their vessels sold in our ports by the French, because we did not, at the time, think it prudent to use all our efforts to procure the restoration of them. This is precisely a case in point, and, having paid then, we have a better right to receive now.

I have thus endeavored to answer the objections of your Excellency, and to show that nothing has been done on either side to impair that claim which accrues to us against His Majesty, from the general principles of justice, as sanctioned by the laws and usages of nations. I have so repeatedly urged the force of these principles in our favor, without receiving from your Excellency more than a simple denial of my conclusions, that I cannot suppose it would be useful to say anything more as to that point. It now only remains for me to inform your Excellency, that I shall forward to the United States the letters which have passed between us, and also a detail of our conversations, that my Government may have this subject before them, as fully as it is in my power to place it. They will then determine what it is proper for them to do: but I cannot close this letter without reminding your Excellency of the unpleasant situation in which they will be placed. Convinced that it can neither be the interest nor the intention of His Majesty to injure them, they will yet see with regret that, for some years past, the conduct of Spain has not been altogether as friendly towards them as they could have wished. I will not probe too deeply into this subject; but I feel it my duty to tell your Excellency, that, in my opinion, something must be done on the part of His Catholic Majesty to adjust our well founded claims in an equal and honorable manner, or I fear he will lessen the friendship of the people and Government of the United States, which has hitherto been sincere and respectful; and I do hope that His Majesty will direct his Minister in the United States to make to our Government some conciliatory propositions, which may tend to preserve a friendly and harmonious intercourse between our two nations; or, if it is more agreeable to His Majesty to make me the organ of these communications I beg your Excellency to believe that it would not be possible to impose on me a more pleasing task, for it is my most anxious wish to prevent a misunderstanding between our two countries, connected together by mutual wants, and freed from the jealousies of a rival commerce, or interfering or rival productions.

With sentiments of the most profound respect and perfect consideration, I have the honor to be, your Excellency's most obedient, humble servant.

To the Senate of the United States:

According to the desire expressed in your resolution of the 28th instant, I now communicate a report of the Secretary of State, with documents relative to complaints against arming the merchant ships and vessels of the United States, and the conduct of the captains and crews of such as have been armed.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

January 31, 1805.

The Secretary of State, to whom the President of the United States has been pleased to refer the resolution of the Senate of the 28th instant, requesting that there may be laid before the Senate such documents and papers, or other information, as the President should judge proper, relative to complaints against arming the merchant ships or vessels of the United States, or the conduct of the captains and crews of such as have been armed, has the honor to annex hereto:

1st. A copy of a letter addressed to the Secretary of State by the Envoy of Great Britain, dated on the 31st of August last.

2d. An extract of a letter to the same, from the late Chargé d'Affaires of France, dated May 6, last, which was preceded and followed by other letters and conversations of the same gentleman, urging the subject upon the attention of the Government. It has been also urged, by the present Minister of France, in his interviews with the Secretary of State.

Of the enclosures alluded to in the aforesaid letter and extract, the only authenticated statement, relative to the conduct of American private armed vessels, which has been received at this Department, is contained in the annexed letter from Mr. George Barnewall, of New York, and the document accompanying it.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES MADISON.

No. 1.

Mr. Merry to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, Aug. 31, 1804.

SIR: I have received information respecting several vessels which have of late been armed in, and have sailed from, the different ports of the United States: some loaded with articles contraband of war, (gunpowder is said to be the general article,) others with cargoes of innocent goods, and others again in ballast. After the diligent inquiry which it has been my duty to make on so important a subject, I think that I can have the honor of stating to you, with certainty, that several vessels of the above description, which are mentioned to be schooner rigged, have sailed lately from the port of Baltimore, while others, of a larger size, even ships of considerable burden, and completely equipped for war, have sailed from the port of Philadelphia, bound to the possessions of His Majesty's enemies in the East as well as the West Indies. It is said, that the object of some of these equipments is to force a trade with the blacks in the island of St. Domingo; in which attempt, the public prints have stated so circumstantially, as to leave no doubt on the subject, that two American vessels have been captured by French cruisers, after making resistance; but I have strong reason to believe that the destination of others, particularly from the port of Philadelphia, has been with cargoes of contraband articles to the enemy's possessions in the East and West Indies. Let their destinations, however, be what they may, it cannot, I conceive, but be justly considered, that such armaments, on the part of the citizens of a neutral State, must be attended with consequences prejudicial to a belligerent Power, and may, therefore, be deemed rightly as offensive; for which reason, the law of nations has stated one of the first obligations of neutrality to be, that of abstaining from all participation in warlike expeditions. The armed vessels alluded to may become the property of the King's enemies, either by capture at sea, or by purchase in the ports to which they are destined, and are thus in readiness to be converted immediately into instruments of hostility against His Majesty; while, in another point of view, they are calculated to protect the vessels, when they are loaded with contraband articles, against the lawful search and detention of a lawfully commissioned cruiser, when the latter shall happen to be of inferior force. Indeed, I conceive that it may not be giving too great an extent to the principle of the law of nations, without attending to the nature of the cargo, to consider the very arms, ammunition, and other implements of war, with which such vessels are furnished, as contraband articles, when the vessels have been thus equipped without the authority of the nation to which they belong.

I understand, sir, that the arguments in question have, in fact, taken place under no commission or authority whatever from the Government of the United States. I have, therefore, thought it my duty to have the honor of making you acquainted with the information that has reached me on this subject; and if the observations which I have taken the liberty to make upon it should happily be conformable to the sentiments of the American Government, I can safely trust to their justice, as well as to their jealousy of observing the most strict neutrality in the present war, to take such measures as shall appear to them the most proper for suppressing the illegal proceedings complained of, on the part of those individual citizens of the United States who shall appear to be concerned in them.

I have the honor to be, with high respect and consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,
ANT. MERRY.

HON. JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

No. 2.

Extract of a letter from the Chargé des Affaires de France, dated May 7, 1804, and addressed to the Secretary of State.

The undersigned is informed, in a manner which leaves him no room to doubt it, that the American merchants who pursue this commerce, [meaning the commerce with St. Domingo,] publicly arm, in the ports of the United States, vessels which are intended to support, by force, a traffic contrary to the law of nations, and to repel the efforts which the cruisers of the French Republic are authorized to make, in order to prevent it. These armaments have also for their object to cover the conveyance of munitions to the revolted of that colony. The Government of the United States cannot be ignorant of these facts, which are public; the consequences thereof have already been manifested in the West Indies, where the public papers advise that there have been actions between the French cruisers and American vessels carrying on this commerce.

In considering the matter merely under the view of the law of nations, it is manifest that American citizens, under the very eyes of their Government, carry on a private and piratical war against a Power with which the United States are at peace. The undersigned would be wanting in his duty if he did not vindicate, under such circumstances, the rights and the dignity of his Government, which are openly injured; and if he did not call the attention of Mr. Madison to the disagreeable reflections which the French Government would have a right to make, if the silence of the local authorities respecting acts of this nature should be imitated by the Government of the United States.

The French Government certainly could not see, without a profound regret, that, after having given to the United States the most marked proofs of the desire to place the good understanding of the two nations upon the most immovable foundations, by abandoning national interests, which might have eventually produced collisions, individual interests should now be permitted to compromise this good understanding. Its regret would be still much greater if, when the dignity and the safety of France are openly injured in the United States, by their citizens, the American Government should preserve, respecting these violations, a silence, which would appear to offer an excuse, and even a sort of encouragement, to all the excesses which cupidity may attempt. Besides that, the peace of the two nations cannot but be seriously compromised by the proceedings of the individuals, and by the reprisals to which they must necessarily lead; this state of things would infallibly tend to diminish the amicable dispositions which the two Governments wish to cultivate.

NEW YORK, Sept. 6, 1804.

SIR: The sufferings of innocent individuals induce me to the liberty I now take of submitting the following statement to your consideration:

In the month of June last, I despatched the ship Hopewell, Preserved Sisson, master, and the brig Rockland, — Akens, master, with suitable cargoes, destined for Aux Cayes, in the Island of Hispaniola: the former armed for defence with twelve six-pound cannon and two twelve-pounders, with small arms, &c., a crew of thirty-five in number, besides passengers; the latter, with eight six-pounders, small arms, &c., and a crew of twenty in number, besides passengers. Both these vessels were regularly cleared at the custom-house of this district, and sailed on their intended voyage on the 17th of June. In the prosecution of which, they were met with and captured by a privateer belonging to individuals in the island of Guadaloupe, whither they were carried, and their crews put into close confinement. I beg leave to refer you to the document enclosed for the particulars of the situation in which those unfortunate men are placed; and have the honor to be, &c.,

GEO. BARNEWALL.

JAMES MADISON, Esq., &c. &c.

GUADALOUPE, POINT PETRE,

July 26, 1804.

SIR: No doubt, ere this, you have heard of the capture of the Hopewell and brig Rockland. Owing to S. W. and S. S. W. winds, was obliged to go to the eastward of Bermuda, in lat. 27 deg. 38 min., long. 61, 57 min., on the 30th of June, at 3 A. M. Saw a brig which appeared to be dogging us, and at daylight she bore down, on us, hoisted an English ensign, and fired a gun to leeward: we were then under all the sail we could set; but finding she came up with us very fast, we hoisted American colors, and fired a gun to leeward, and shortened sail. I hailed the Rockland, and desired Captain Akens to keep on our lee bow, and near us, as I wished to speak the privateer first, and know what he was, before we attempted anything. She was then on our weather quarter; the Rockland not keeping in her station, dropping more to leeward, and nearly on our lee quarter; the privateer was then almost within hail of us, but immediately up helm and run alongside the Rockland, and commenced firing under English colors, which was returned from the brig. The privateer being between us and the brig, prevented my firing until I got in a situation to fire clear of the Rockland, which was in less than a moment, when we commenced firing to the best advantage we could; the Rockland fired only one broadside and some musketry, when she was boarded; they only left three men on board, sheered off, and gave us a broadside, and attempted to board us, but was repulsed by our quarter gun pikes and musketry; they then kept clear of our pikes, and played continually with all their men, with nothing but musketry. Our men seeing their shipmates falling, most of the landsmen quit their quarters: the privateer seeing this, attempted the second time to board us, by cutting our nettings, and overpowered us by numbers; was obliged to haul down our colors, and quit the deck, otherwise be cut in pieces; we had three killed, four badly wounded, and two slightly wounded; the first who fell was poor Mr. Bird; he was standing near me; he received one ball through his body, and one through his head, and never after spoke a word. I begged him some time before to go below, and prepare his papers: he said they were already prepared, and would not quit the deck; in consequence of which all his papers were found. It was not my intention to engage the privateer, unless I thought we were sure of getting clear; but the Rockland commencing so quick, I could not then avoid it; but even had we suffered them to board us, they would have made a prize of us; the passengers on board were sufficient to condemn us; upward of one hundred letters were found with them directed to different parts of St. Domingo, and, among the passengers, there were two noted generals who were well known by the Frenchmen; and among Mr. Bird's papers were found instructions from Mr. Lapierre pointing out the whole plan of the voyage. Many other letters were found with Mr. Bird's papers, all of which tended to condemn the ship, which they showed me at Point Petre when I was examined.

When they boarded us, nothing saved our lives but their thinking we were English, and asked us how we dare engage under American colors; and did not believe we were Americans even after we arrived. After the Rockland was boarded we engaged the privateer close on board for forty minutes. When the black General, a passenger, found we were captured, he ran below with a pistol, with an intention to blow the ship up, and with much difficulty we prevented it. He set the cartridges on fire in the cabin and steerage, which was in pouch tubs, and my laying the magazine scuttle over, saved the ship and our lives. When he found he could not blow the ship up, he put the pistol to his head, and blew his brains out. The privateer took out all the passengers, officers, and men, except myself, carpenter, two boys, and one of our men, badly wounded. The privateer continued with us until we arrived in this port, which was on the 17th July, and was immediately put altogether in a most miserable prison with nothing to eat but stinking beef and coarse bread, and very short even of that. They will not suffer me to see any Americans, nor have any communication with anybody. There is a schooner called the Snake in the Grass, bought in New York and fitted out at Salem with five guns taken and brought here a few days before me: one of the mates is allowed to go out at times, and this was the only opportunity I had to write. They say that orders have gone to America, that every vessel bound to St. Domingo, if taken, shall be treated as pirates. God only knows what they mean to do with us. I beg you will do all in your power to get our Government to claim us, otherwise I do not know what they may do: they seem to be inveterate against the Americans, and even told me every ship and captain's name that was armed from New York.

Captain Akens had his mate killed, and one man, and several wounded, himself wounded, and died at this place on the 22d instant.

The schooner Snake in the Grass was commanded by James Mansfield, who is also in prison, with all his men. The vessel will be condemned, although they did not fire a shot. As no protest can be made here, I thought it best to let the officers sign this letter with me. Several large privateers are getting ready to go down in the bite after the Americans. The privateer that took us was the brig Ferbriskey, Captain Antwan, with ten long French sixes, two twelve-pound carronades, one long eighteen-pounder, and one hundred and fifty men. The French seem to be very inveterate against the Americans, and insult us as they pass the prison. All that I can say more is to request you to do what you can with our Government, to claim us as Americans. I think the manner in which the French privateer engaged us, under English colors, will be a sufficient reason for them to claim us. All that I can say more is, that your ship and property were defended with spirit, until overpowered by numbers.

I am, sir, with respect, your most obedient servant,

SPAIN.

[Communicated to Congress, December 9, 1805, and February 18, 1813.*]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The depredations which had been committed on the commerce of the United States during a preceding war, by persons under the authority of Spain, are sufficiently known to all: these made it a duty to require from that Government indemnifications for our injured citizens. A convention was accordingly entered into between the Minister of the United States at Madrid, and the Minister of that Government for Foreign Affairs, by which it was agreed that spoiliations committed by Spanish subjects, and carried into ports of Spain, should be paid for by that nation; and that those committed by French subjects and carried into Spanish ports should remain for further discussion. Before this convention was returned to Spain with our ratification, the transfer of Louisiana by France to the United States took place; an event as unexpected as disagreeable to Spain. From that moment she seemed to change her conduct and disposition towards us. It was first manifested by her protest against the right of France to alienate Louisiana to us, which, however, was soon retracted, and the right confirmed. Then high offence was manifested at the act of Congress establishing a collection district on the Mobile, although, by an authentic declaration, immediately made, it was expressly confined to our acknowledged limits, and she now refused to ratify the convention signed by her own Minister under the eye of his Sovereign, unless we would consent to alterations of its terms, which would have affected our claims against her for the spoiliations by French subjects carried into Spanish ports.

* Although these Messages are of different dates, the papers transmitted exhibit the posture of affairs with Spain at the date of the first Message, and, in many cases, were only duplicate copies of the same paper.

To obtain justice, as well as to restore friendship, I thought a special mission advisable; and accordingly appointed James Monroe Minister Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary, to Madrid, and, in conjunction with our Minister Resident there, to endeavor to procure a ratification of the former convention, and to come to an understanding with Spain as to the boundaries of Louisiana. It appeared at once that her policy was to reserve herself for events, and, in the mean time, to keep our differences in an undetermined state: this will be evident from the papers now communicated to you. After nearly five months of fruitless endeavor to bring them to some definite and satisfactory result, our Ministers ended the conferences without having been able to obtain indemnity for the spoiliations of any description, or any satisfaction as to the boundaries of Louisiana, other than a declaration that we had no rights eastward of the Iberville, and that our line to the west was one which would have left us but a string of land on that bank of the river Mississippi. Our injured citizens were thus left without any prospect of retribution from the wrong-doer; and, as to boundary, each party was to take its own course. That which they have chosen to pursue will appear from the documents now communicated. They authorize the inference, that it is their intention to advance on our possessions, until they shall be repressed by an opposing force. Considering that Congress alone is constitutionally invested with the power of changing our condition from peace to war, I have thought it my duty to await their authority for using force in any degree which could be avoided. I have barely instructed the officers stationed in the neighborhood of the aggressions, to protect our citizens from violence, to patrol within the borders actually delivered to us, and not to go out of them but when necessary to repel an inroad, or to rescue a citizen, or his property; and the Spanish officers remaining at New Orleans are required to depart without further delay. It ought to be noted here, that, since the late change in the state of affairs in Europe, Spain has ordered her cruisers and courts to respect our treaty with her.

The conduct of France, and the part she may take in the misunderstandings between the United States and Spain, are too important to be unconsidered. She was prompt and decided in her declarations that our demands on Spain for French spoiliations carried into Spanish ports, were included in the settlement between the United States and France. She took at once the ground, that she acquired no right from Spain, and had meant to deliver us none to the eastward of Iberville; her silence as to the western boundary leaving us to infer her opinion might be against Spain in that quarter. Whatever direction she might mean to give to these differences, it does not appear that she has contemplated their proceeding to actual rupture, or that, at the date of our last advices from Paris, her Government had any suspicion of the hostile attitude Spain had taken here. On the contrary, we have reason to believe that she was disposed to effect a settlement, on a plan analogous to what our Ministers had proposed, and so comprehensive, as to remove, as far as possible, the grounds of future collision and controversy on the eastern as well as western side of the Mississippi.

The present crisis in Europe is favorable for pressing such a settlement, and not a moment should be lost in availing ourselves of it. Should it pass unimproved, our situation would become much more difficult; formal war is not necessary, it is not probable it will follow, but the protection of our citizens, the spirit and honor of our country, require that force should be interposed to a certain degree. It will probably contribute to advance the object of peace.

But the course to be pursued will require the command of means which it belongs to Congress exclusively to yield or to deny. To them I communicate every fact material for their information, and the documents necessary to enable them to judge for themselves. To their wisdom, then, I look for the course I am to pursue, and will pursue with sincere zeal that which they shall approve.

TH. JEFFERSON.

No. 2.

DECEMBER 6, 1805.

SIR: In order to give to Congress the details necessary for their full information of the state of things between Spain and the United States, I send them the communication and documents now enclosed. Although stated to be confidential, that term is not meant to be extended to all the documents, the greater part of which are proper for the public eye: it is applied only to the Message itself, and to the letters from our own and foreign Ministers, which, if disclosed, might throw additional difficulties in the way of accommodation. These alone, therefore, are delivered to the Legislature in confidence that they will be kept secret.

TH. JEFFERSON.

The President of the Senate.

No. 3.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, complying with the resolution of the 18th January, 1813.

JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 18, 1813.

Relations with Spain.

No. 4.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Feb. 17, 1813.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the confidential resolution of the Senate of the 18th instant, has the honor, in compliance therewith, to submit to the President the following papers:

1st. Instructions given by the Secretary of State to Charles Pinckney, Esq., Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid, under date of the 6th February, and 10th April, 1804; and to Robert R. Livingston, of the 31st January, 1804.

2d. The Correspondence between Charles Pinckney, Esq., and the Spanish Government relative to the ratification of the Convention of 1802.

3d. Correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Marquis de Casa Yrujo, on the same subject.

4th. Instructions given by the Secretary of State to Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney, under date of the 15th April, 8th July, 26th October, 1804; 4th May, and 23d May, 1805.

5th. A letter from Mr. Monroe to M. Talleyrand, of 8th November, 1804; and a letter from M. Talleyrand to General Armstrong, of 21st December, 1804, in reply thereto.

6th. The correspondence between Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney, and the Spanish Government.

These papers communicate all that passed between the dates specified in the resolution, on the subject-matter thereof; no negotiation was ever entered into with Spain, under the instructions to Messrs. Armstrong and Bowdoin, nor was there ever any negotiation with France, either for the cession of East Florida, or for indemnities for French seizures, and condemnations in the ports of Spain, during the late war with France.

All which is respectfully submitted:

JAMES MONROE.

I.—Instructions from the Secretary of State to Mr. Pinckney and to Mr. Livingston.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, to Mr. Pinckney, Minister to Spain.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 29, 1803.

SIR: You will have learned, doubtless, from Paris, that a treaty has been signed there, by which New Orleans and the rest of Louisiana is conveyed to the United States. The Floridas are not included in the treaty, being, it appears, still held by Spain. The enclosed copy of a communication, from the Spanish Minister here, contains a refusal of His Catholic Majesty to alienate any part of his colonial possessions. A copy of the answer to it is also enclosed.

At the date of this refusal, it was probably unknown that the cession by France to the United States had been, or would be made. This consideration, with the kind of reasons given for the refusal, and the situation of Spain, resulting from the war between Great Britain and France, lead to a calculation that, at present, there may be less repugnance to our views. The letter, herewith addressed to Mr. Monroe, gives the instructions under which the negotiations are to be pursued. Being for your use, as well as his, it is left unsealed, and in your cipher; a copy in his having been forwarded to Paris.

In case Mr. Monroe should not have arrived, but be expected at Madrid, you will forbear to enter into negotiations on this subject, unless they should be brought on by the Spanish Government, and the moment should be critical for securing the object on favorable terms. The maximum of price, contemplated by the President, will be found in the instructions. At this price the bargain cannot be a bad one. But, considering the motives which Spain ought now to feel for making the arrangements easy and satisfactory; the certainty that the Floridas must, at no distant period, find a way into our hands; and the tax on our finances, resulting from the purchase of Louisiana, which makes a further purchase immediately less convenient; it may be hoped, as it is to be wished, that the bargain will be considerably cheapened. Under such circumstances, it would not be proper to accede to the terms which, under others, might have been admissible.

In case Mr. Monroe should be obliged to decline or postpone his visit to Spain, I have requested him to give you his ideas on the expediency of your proceeding or not in the negotiation. The advantage given him by his opportunity of scanning the policy of Great Britain and France, in relation to Spain, and of estimating the course of the war, will render his opinion on that point worthy of your confidence.

You will observe, in the answer to the Marquis de Yrujo's communication, a merited animadversion on the motives assigned for the restoration of the deposit. The United States can never admit that this was of favor, not of right; nor receive as a favor what they demand as a right.

As the indemnifications claimed from Spain are to be incorporated in the overtures for the Floridas; it will be advisable to leave them, although within your ordinary functions, for the joint negotiations of yourself and Mr. Monroe. In these, as proceeding from an extraordinary mission, the subject can be pressed with greater force and more probable effect. Should Mr. Monroe, however, not be likely soon to join you, and there be a prospect of extending the convention, not accepted here, to the claims admitted in it, you will continue to urge them on the justice of the Spanish Government; and in terms, and a tone, that will make it sensible of the impolicy of disappointing the reasonable expectations of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

CHARLES PINCKNEY, Esq.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State of the United States to Robert R. Livingston, then their Minister Plenipotentiary in France.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 31, 1804.

The convention with Spain, which was not agreed to at the last session of Congress, has been resumed and ratified during the present. The objection to it was, that it did not provide, in sufficient extent, for repairing the injuries done to our commerce, particularly in omitting the case of captures and condemnations by French cruisers and Consuls, within Spanish responsibility. As the convention does not abandon the omitted cases, but merely leaves them for further negotiation, it was judged best, on the whole, not longer to deprive that class of our citizens, who are comprehended in the convention, of the benefit of its provisions. The claims of the others will be pursued with due attention; and may, perhaps, be advantageously brought into the negotiation with which Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinckney will be jointly charged. Such of them as Spain refused to submit to arbitration, as proceeding from French citizens, and not from Spanish subjects, are clearly supported by strict justice, and by the soundest principles of public law. French citizens, within the jurisdiction of Spain, were, for the time, subjects of Spain. Spain had a right to their allegiance, and was responsible for their conduct. As well might she say, that a murder or robbery committed by a Frenchman on an American, in the streets of Madrid, was to be punished or redressed by France alone, not by her, as pretend that the illegal proceedings of Frenchmen, within Spanish jurisdiction, in the case of spoiliations on our commerce, are to depend on France, not on her, for indemnification. Supposing France to be liable eventually, Spain is liable in the first resort, and can be relieved from it only by showing that she exerted all the reasonable means in her power for preventing and correcting the wrong, without being able to succeed in either. At first she seemed sensible of this. Her plea was, in substance, that circumstances did not permit her to control the conduct of French agents and citizens within her jurisdiction. This plea being not very honorable to her sovereignty, or sufficiently established by proof; and being not very consistent with the satisfaction which she may find it expedient to yield to other nations, particularly to Great Britain, whose commerce is, at this time, suffering like injuries from French cruisers and Consuls; it has given place to the plea that the erasure of the second article of our convention with France, in 1800, releases Spain as well as France; because France being liable, in justice, to Spain, for the indemnities paid by the latter to the United States, would indirectly be deprived of the benefit of that release to her. To this the reply is given by the remarks already made. The injury proceeded from Spain. To Spain we look for reparation. Her claim for reimbursement on France is a question between her and France. It may be just, or not just, according to circumstances unknown to the United States. Spain may have found, for anything we know, an equivalent for this use of her ports, and her permission in advantages yielded by, or expected from France. To this the fact may be added, that the indemnification has throughout been claimed from Spain and not from France; or, if from France, the application has been neither patronized, nor authorized by the Government of the United States. Applications of this sort may have been made by individual sufferers: but, it is believed, that they have, in no instance, received the countenance of the American legation at Paris. It is maintained, however, on the part of Spain, that a resort in form has been had to the French Government, in such cases. Will you make the inquiry and communicate the result? It will not be amiss to know the truth, as it may the more effectually silence the sophistry of Spain. But, should the result justify the assertion on her side, it will not vary the merits of the question. The resort of individuals to the French Government could not be pretended to have that effect. If made under the voluntary auspices of an American Minister it might have been unknown to, or disapproved by the Government here. Nay, if made by order of the Government itself, it would not preclude a just resort to Spain, unless accompanied by a positive or clearly implied discharge of the latter from her responsibility.

"It has been thought proper to give you this view of the subject that it may guide the communications thereon, which it may be expedient for you, at any time, to hold with the French Government."

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Chas. Pinckney, Esq., then Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Feb. 6, 1804.

The Senate having resumed at the present session the convention with Spain, postponed at the last, have thought proper to ratify it, and the President has completed the act on the part of the United States. The instrument is now returned to you with these sanctions, in order to be exchanged for the ratification of His Catholic Majesty. You will hasten this formality as much as possible, and forward the result to the Government here, that no time may be lost in procuring to our citizens the benefits stipulated to them. To favor despatch, as well as to guard against casualties, duplicates and even triplicates will be proper.

In concurring in this partial provision for the indemnities due from Spain, it is to be particularly understood that it proceeds from no other considerations than a wish to shorten the delay of relief to that portion of the claimants who are included in the provision, and a determination to avail the residue of the reserve, expressly made in behalf of their claims, by the act of the convention. When the decision of the Senate was postponed at the last session, it was justly hoped that, before the succeeding one, the Spanish Government would have yielded to the reasonableness and justice of giving to the provision the extent required by the United States; in which case, the arrangements would have been simplified, and a foundation laid at once for closing all controversies on the subject. The final refusal of Spain to concur in these views, has been thought to give a preference to the course now adopted.

None of the pleas urged by the Spanish Government, can in the least invalidate the justice of the claims for injuries committed by French citizens or agents within her jurisdiction.

If His Catholic Majesty be sovereign in his own dominions, aliens within them are answerable to him for their conduct, and he, of course, is answerable for it to others. This is a principle founded too evidently in reason and usage to be controverted. As well might Spain say that a theft or robbery, committed in the streets of Madrid, by a Frenchman on an American, is to be redressed by France, and not by her, as pretend that redress is to be sought for spoiliations committed by cruisers from, or condemnations within, Spanish ports. Nor is there any room for the distinction between the injuries proceeding from the French cruisers and French consuls. With respect to the consuls, their acts were either authorized or not authorized by Spain; if authorized by Spain, Spain is answerable for giving them the authority; if not authorized by Spain, they could not be authorized at all; the law of nations giving them no such authority, and France having no right to give it; and being acts without authority, they are not to be regarded as consular acts, but as much the acts of private individuals as the cruises or any other irregularities committed or instituted by French citizens within the jurisdiction of Spain. To say that the consuls derived their authority from the sanction given by Spain to the authority derived from France, (without which sanction, positive, or permissive, it is clear that the authority of France, within the jurisdiction of Spain, would be a nullity,) is still to rest the condemnation by the consuls on the authority of Spain, and to leave her responsible for them.

Under every aspect, therefore, Spain is bound to do justice in this case to the citizens of the United States, unless she not only pleads a duress, suspending her free agency, and prostrating her national honor, but proves the reality of this duress; and not only proves this duress, but proves, moreover, first, that she did everything in her power to prevent the evil; next, that she did everything in her power to obtain reparation for it; and, lastly, that, in tolerating the evil, she did not deliberately and wilfully surrender the neutral rights under her protection to advantages, positive or negative, obtained or expected by herself or France.

The suggestion, that France was resorted to for redress was unfounded. It does not appear that any such resort was authorized by the Government of the United States, whilst the claims against Spain have been uniform and pressing; nor is it believed that any interpositions have proceeded from the American legation at Paris. Had, indeed, such interpositions taken place, they would, in no respect, lessen the obligations of Spain. Individuals may have made their applications to the French Government, but it will not be pretended that the merits of the question can be affected by that circumstance.

The plea on which it seems that the Spanish Government now principally relies is, the erasure of the second article from our late convention with France, by which France was released from the indemnities due for spoiliations committed under her immediate responsibility to the United States. This plea did not appear in the early objections of Spain to our claims. It was an after thought, resulting from the insufficiency of every other plea, and is certainly as little valid as any other. The injuries for which indemnities are claimed from Spain, though committed by Frenchmen, took place under Spanish authority. Spain, therefore, is answerable for them; to her we have looked, and continue to look, for redress. If the injuries done to us by her resulted in any manner from injuries done to her by France, she may, if she pleases, resort to France, as we resort to her. But whether her resort to France would be just or unjust, is a question between her and France, not between either her and us, or us and France. We claim against her, not against France. In releasing France, therefore, we have not released her.

The claims, again, from which France was released, were admitted by France, and the release was for a valuable consideration in a corresponding release of the United States from certain claims on them. The claims we make on Spain were never admitted by France, nor made on France by the United States; they made, therefore, no part of the bargain with her, and could not be included in the release. The only supposition on which Spain could turn us over to France would be, that of her being in a state of absolute duress, of her being merely the staff by which the blow was given by France. But even on this supposition, the injuries done by France, through Spain, could not, by any fair interpretation, be confounded with the injuries released to France, by which could be meant such injuries only as proceeded from her own individual responsibility, and as were, in the ordinary course of things, chargeable on her.

The last plea, under which refuge has been sought by Spain against the justice of our claims, is, the opinion of four or five American lawyers, given on a case stated, without doubt, by some one of her own agents. An argument of this sort does not call for refutation, but for regret that the Spanish Government did not see how little such an appeal from the ordinary and dignified discussions of the two Governments, by their regular functionaries, to the authority of private opinions, and of private opinions so obtained, was consistent either with the respect it owed to itself, or with that which it owed to the Government of the United States; that it did not even reflect on the reply so obvious, that four or five private opinions, however respectable as such, could have no weight against the probability that other lawyers had been consulted, whose opinions were not quoted, because they were not the same; and that, if the Government here could descend to the experiment, little difficulty could be found in selecting more numerous authorities of the same kind, not only in the United States, but among the jurists of Spain.

Extract.—The Secretary of State to Charles Pinckney, Esq.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 10, 1804.

SIR: The footing on which your last communications with Mr. Cevallos left the subject of the South American claims of our citizens, requires little to be added to what has heretofore been said in relation to them. I shall observe only, that there is a difference between your statement and construction of the Spanish ordinances and those of Mr. Cevallos; on which I cannot undertake to decide, without a fuller view of the question than I have the means of taking. On the arrival of Mr. Monroe, he will join you in the discussion, and the provision due to our citizens may, perhaps, be incorporated with the principal negotiations which will then be undertaken. In the meantime, you will be under no restraint from taking advantage of any favorable change in the disposition of the Spanish Government, for obtaining justice from it. This is the more to be desired, as it will simplify the transaction, committed jointly to yourself and Mr. Monroe, and leave, applicable to other contested cases, any sum that may be stipulated by the United States in that transaction, and which will probably be inadequate to the aggregate of the cases.

According to information already received, many vessels, belonging to citizens of the United States, have suffered from irregularities in the West Indies, in which Spanish authorities have, in some way or other, participated, and for which, of course, redress will lie against the Spanish Government; and new cases are daily added. As soon as the requisite statements can be made of them, they will form a ground for claiming just reparation. In the meantime, you will represent, generally, to that Government, the illegal and unfriendly practice which exists, and the right which the United States have to expect from the justice of His Catholic Majesty, and his regard to the friendship and harmony of the two nations, immediate instructions to his officers in the West Indies which may put an end to the practice.

II.—Correspondence between Mr. Pinckney and the Spanish Government, relative to the ratification of the Convention of 1803.

Mr. Pinckney to Mr. Cevallos.

MADRID, January 11, 1804.

SIR: I had the honor lately to inform your Excellency of the ratification and exchange of ratifications of the treaty and convention, respecting the cession of Louisiana; I have now the honor to inform your Excellency, that I have since received another despatch from the Secretary of State, informing me that Congress have passed an act authorizing and enabling the President to take possession of and occupy the said Territory, as ceded by France to us; and have provided for the temporary government thereof, by means calculated to maintain and protect the inhabitants of Louisiana in the free enjoyment of their liberty, properties, and religion. They have also passed another law, for furnishing the means to pay the sums which they have given to the French Republic for the same.

In consequence of this, the President of the United States has issued a joint commission to General Wilkinson, the General commanding the forces of the United States, and Governor Claiborne, of the Mississippi State, to receive from the Prefect of Louisiana, or person authorized, the territory in question, and to possess and occupy the same in the name of the United States.

I should have contented myself with barely making the official communication of these events, if the late communication of your Excellency and your letter did not impress me with a belief that there was something in the observations of your Excellency, and the apparent unwillingness of the Spanish Government, either to arrange our pre-existing differences and claims, or to cordially acquiesce in the cession of Louisiana, which required an answer, and such a one as should still go to prove the justice, the moderation, and the friendship of our Government for Spain.

As I do believe things are growing to a serious height between the two Governments, such as may, possibly, produce war; while we can, with honor, and with something like equal and honorable terms, and before any event occurs, or at least before we know, officially, of any, which may prevent all discussion, and drive things to extremities, I am to request the serious and early attention of you Excellency to the following observations. There are three subjects of discussion between the Spanish and American Governments:

1. The actual cession of Louisiana;
2. The proposed cession of Florida;
3. The claims of American citizens.

As to the first, it may be said, on the part of the United States, that they long ago foresaw the difficulties which would arise from any other nation but themselves possessing the mouth of the Mississippi, and endeavored, by every friendly means, to do them away. They made various propositions to Spain, which were rejected; and, in the interim, the Spanish officer at New Orleans deprived the citizens of the United States of the deposit stipulated for in the Treaty of 1795; this roused the feelings of the whole nation, and their Government, true to their professions of respect and friendship for Spain, and, at the same time, convinced of the necessity of applying some effectual remedy to the evil, sent to Europe an extraordinary mission to treat on the subject. At this time, the Spanish Government officially announced that they had ceded Louisiana to France, and that we must direct ourselves to that Government for any acquisition of territory which might be convenient to us. Our Ministers at Paris made this acquisition; hence accrues to us a right founded on justice.

On the part of Spain, it is said, that Louisiana was ceded to France, under a promise from that Power not to part with it. I presume that the French Government will be able to show that this promise could not be supposed to bind them under the circumstances in which they found themselves last spring; but be this as it may, the promise was neither an equitable nor a legal obligation on the United States, because it had not been made known to them. Repeatedly and earnestly did I ask your Excellency upon what terms Louisiana was ceded to France; for twelve months I could get no answer; at last I was told by your Excellency, on the 31st March, that Louisiana was ceded to France, "avec la même étendue qu'elle a actuellement entre les mains de l'Espagne, et qu'elle avoit lorsque la France la possédoit, et telle qu'elle doit être après les traités passés subséquemment entre l'Espagne et d'autres Etats;" and as no mention was made of any restriction, when it was known that we wished to purchase, we had a right to suppose that there was none. But, even if there could be any doubt, it is cleared up by your Excellency's letter to me on the 4th of May; for your Excellency there tells me, in express terms, that my Government "podrá dirigirse al Gobierno Francés para negociar la adquisición de territorios (en Luisiana) que convengan á su interes."

From these letters, which were remitted to our Ministers Extraordinary at Paris, and to our Government, it is clear the United States were in possession of official intelligence that the country was ceded; nor did the least hint drop from Spain of any secret article. She had sold, or exchanged, and conveyed the territory to France; it was a fact known to all Europe, and officially announced to us; it was equally known that we wished that country, and the reasons of our doing so, are such as the world must approve. We have fairly bought and furnished the means of paying for it; and if, after all this, Spain should refuse her acquiescence, and, to possess it, war should be the consequence, I leave it to the enlightened mind of your Excellency to judge who are in the right, and what must be the opinion of every impartial nation as to the procedure. But why should Spain refuse her acquiescence? She has shown already that she did not consider the keeping of Louisiana as indispensable or necessary to her; it was originally a French colony, and never came into the possession of Spain until 1763; it therefore, cannot claim that sort of affection which old countries sometimes entertain for colonies originally established by themselves, and considered as parts of their family. Nor can Spain give that as a reason, as she has always seemed to consider Louisiana and Florida as temporary possessions little valuable to her; nor has she ever hesitated to part with them, when she found it her interest to do so; and, if she has no objection to part with them to other Powers, why should she not wish to see them in our hands? Is she more jealous of us than of others? Have we more power, more ambition, or are we more capable of doing her injury, than Great Britain or France? If she thinks so, she mistakes most egregiously the character of our people, the nature of our Government, or the true interests of a country devoted only to peaceful and honorable pursuits. Does she suppose we have less affection for Spain than the Governments I have mentioned, which have each, in their turn, possessed Florida and Louisiana? This question is at once answered, by saying, that, while we benefit, we cannot rival or interfere with each other; that our commerce is extensive, and mutually advantageous; and that these are the situations which are generally the parents of a sincere and lasting affection between nations; there is but one possible mode of our differing or interfering, and that is by the collision of unsettled boundaries. Let us now forever remove the possibility of this collision. We offer to come forward honorably and openly on this subject: I am hopeful Spain will do the same, and that I shall soon receive such propositions from your Excellency as I shall be authorized to accept.

As to the second subject of discussion, it has been urged, on the part of the United States, that Florida was desirable to them from its local situation; that, by getting it, they should avoid the necessity of submitting to similar evils to those they had suffered in Louisiana; that this country was of little or no use to Spain; that it cost her much money to maintain it; that it greatly increased the probability of her being engaged in war, and lessened her means of supporting it; and that the Spanish capital and industry employed in the trade of that country might be much more advantageously employed in carrying on the commerce of the more fertile provinces of South America. These reasons, it was supposed, would have much weight; yet, the Government of the United States were willing to pay a fair price for it. They had turned their attention to the subject, and saw that misunderstandings must sooner or later arise, and they proposed, with honest intentions, the means they thought most likely to prevent it.

On the part of Spain it is said, that, the system adopted by His Majesty, not to part with any portion of his dominions, prevents him from acceding to the wishes of the American Government; and that, moreover, he is bound, by treaties, not to dismember his American empire. It is not recollected that any other reason is assigned, and to these it may be answered—

1st. That it is unwise to adhere to any general system contrary to the dictates of sound policy; and

2d. That no opposition will or can, with propriety, be made by any foreign Power, to the cession of Florida to the United States; for that country has changed masters so often since the Treaty of Utrecht, that it, at least, is exempted from the general restriction of that treaty; nor, until lately, has been much value annexed to it by Spain. Other arguments might be adduced; but, as it is known that neither the interest of France or England will be injured by this cession, there are reasonable grounds to suppose that neither of them will object to it; and, if they do not, it is presumed that no other Power will. These reasons, then, lose their strength, and leave the naked question of expediency. This, in fact, is the only point for His Majesty's Ministers to inquire into; and if they, in their wisdom, determine that it would be for the interest of Spain to part with this province, no foreign nation would have the unkindness to oppose it, nor should any general system be suffered to do it. The reasons before mentioned, and which were detailed on a former occasion, prove the actual value of this country to Spain is small; and if it is supposed that it acts as a protection or frontier to any other of her dominions, it is a mistake; it may be the means of bringing about a rupture, which might endanger the others, but it can never be the means of protecting them. It may, and but too probably will, happen, that the seeds of dissension sown in that country will spread to others, where dissension, but for this, would never have been known. If it is believed (and it is hoped it will be) that ambition does not direct the views of the American Government, then no suspicion can be entertained of the sincerity of their declarations, and its proper weight will, of course, be given to their opinions. But even if it was supposed for a moment, that they were guided by ambition, would it not be wise and prudent in Spain to deprive them of all pretext for the further gratification of this passion, by giving up to them, upon reasonable terms, (and upon no other is it asked,) a province which is of no use to her, and one which must fall into the hands of her neighbor if she chooses to attack it? This is an idea but little connected with the real question; for the conduct of the Government of the United States leaves no room to suppose that they are guided by ambition. The wish to purchase a barren and almost uninhabited country could not arise from such a passion; it has its source in the wisdom and prudence of those who view this purchase as the best and readiest means of settling present disputes, and of establishing, upon a solid basis, future peace and friendship between Spain and the United States.

On the 3d topic, viz. the claims of American citizens, little remains to be said, for the subject has been discussed in all its various forms; and the result is, a difference of opinion between the two Governments. One or the other must be wrong; and, as it is presumed that it is equally the interest and the wish of both that the difference should be amicably arranged, it becomes expedient to refer it to the same impartial tribunal, as the only means of accomplishing this desirable end. To this the Government of the United States will agree, although they themselves have paid those who had similar claims upon them without a reference, and might, therefore, with some degree of propriety, insist upon receiving payment in the same way.

The importance of the foregoing subjects call for the serious attention of both Governments, and it is believed that, if they are properly investigated, no material difference of opinion can exist. Peace, harmony, and friendship, it is presumed, are equally the interest and the object of both, and justice and friendly acts are the only means by which to obtain and perpetuate them. Spain certainly ought not to feel a disposition to treat us unjustly or unkindly, and we ask nothing but what we are willing to pay for, or have a right to insist on.

Your Excellency well knows how much and how anxiously I have always desired to accommodate every difference between the two countries; fearing that these are increasing, and that things are rushing to a point from which it will be difficult to recede, in the amicable and honorable manner in which an accommodation may yet take place, as the friend of peace and harmony of the two countries, I seize the present moment still to offer to receive any amicable and reasonable propositions that may have a tendency to produce the arrangements and cession which we have so long and ardently wished.

Having reason to suppose your Excellency has received, by a packet, the same late and important intelligence I have of the critical state of things between the two countries, you will at once perceive the reason of my renewing my application at this time, and of my so earnestly requesting an answer. Your Excellency will, I am sure, be convinced that it flows from that ardent desire for the peace and friendship of the two countries, which has always governed the numerous endeavors I have made to preserve them, and which have been such as I trust will impress your Excellency with the conviction of their having been open, sincere, and always with the best intentions.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CHARLES PINCKNEY.

DON PEDRO CEVALLOS,
First Secretary of State, &c.

Mr. Pinckney to Mr. Cevallos.

MADRID, June 1, 1804.

SIR: Since I had the honor to see your Excellency, I have received your letter (31st May) on the subject of an act of Congress, passed by that body, relative to the collection of duties in a district near the Mobile, which you say is a violation of the territory and sovereignty of His Majesty, and which you request me to transmit to my Government. It being their practice to send all the acts of the session at the end of it, there has not yet been time for me to receive these acts, nor have I any information or instructions relative to this particular business; all, therefore, I can do at present is to comply with your request, and transmit your letter by the first safe conveyance. Permit me, on this subject, to remind your Excellency, that, on the first intelligence being received of the cession of Louisiana, I communicated verbally to your Excellency and the Prince of Peace the contents of an official letter I had received from Mr. Livingston and Mr. Monroe, informing me that they considered a great part of West Florida, as so called by the English, to be included. Such letter could not have been written to me officially by them, without their having been so informed by the French Plenipotentiary and Government. The price paid is a proof of the territory being considered as extremely extensive, and if, as must most probably be the case, these were the bounds detailed by the French, it becomes undoubtedly a question between the French and Spanish Governments, and our own; and for this reason, I shall immediately send a copy of your letter to me to Mr. Livingston, our Minister at

Relations with Spain.

Paris, for his information and that of the French Government. It not being the interest of either France, Spain, or the United States to differ about this or any other questions, I am sure that a little examination and moderation will soon accommodate it. Apprehending, however, that your Excellency may, from the tenor of your letter to me, make this a reason for not ratifying the convention, or of adding such clauses to it as may defeat or delay its ratification, and depending very much upon your Excellency's friendship for the United States, and strong sense of the great importance it is to both our countries to be on the most cordial and friendly terms, I again take the liberty of recommending to your Excellency to have the convention ratified as it is, and without addition: this will be to the United States so strong a demonstration of the sincere friendship of His Majesty, that I am sure it will be attended with the best effects; whereas, should it now be refused or delayed, or clogged with additions, it will serve to increase the irritation and animosity of the two countries, and only widen a breach which may now easily be closed.

The great point for the consideration of our two nations, is simply this: Is it the interest of both to be at peace and friendship with each other? or can a slip of territory, nearly barren, or the refusal of the ratifications of the convention, be an equivalent for the expense and consequences of embroiling two nations which ought so strongly and affectionately to be united? Your Excellency, I know, thinks with me on this subject, that it is better to conciliate than irritate. Let, therefore, the different questions between our Governments be kept separate. On the subject of the claims and conventions for their arbitration, we have long since agreed to suffer that to be ratified as it is. This will be a strong proof to our Government that Spain wishes peace and friendship, and relies confidently on the well known good faith, honor, and moderation of the United States, for an amicable and just arrangement of the limits. On this subject a new negotiation can take place; it will then be the negotiation of neighbors having extensive concerns with each other, and among whom questions must sometimes arise; but let them be the questions not only of neighbors, but of friends, and unattended by any circumstances to irritate. Do not show the United States that you have no confidence either in their honor or justice—qualities on which they value themselves more than on power or wealth; but show to them that Spain, having the most perfect confidence in both, will rigidly and honorably adhere to what she has promised, and has no doubt the United States will do the same. This is the conduct I wish your Excellency to pursue, and I think I know the United States sufficiently to be convinced they will meet it with sincerity and cordiality.

Your Excellency sees by this letter the strong reliance I have on your Excellency's being, upon all occasions, the promoter of the peace and friendship of the two countries; and on this confidence I have the honor to subscribe myself

Your Excellency's most obedient and very humble servant,
CHAS. PINCKNEY.

DON PEDRO CEVALLOS,

First Secretary of State, &c.

Mr. Pinckney to Mr. Cevallos.

MADRID, June 22, 1804.

SIR: Believing it not to be agreeable to your Excellency, I probably should not have again troubled you either with personal or written applications on the subject of the exchange of ratifications of the convention, after having done all I could to persuade your Excellency of the policy and propriety of so doing. I should have contented myself with having done my duty, and in requesting and urging upon you the necessity of an early and definitive answer to send to my Government; transmitting which, I should then have left to them to decide, as the rights and interests of our citizens, and the sacred honor and character of our nation, may require. I have, however, just received accounts of such a nature, as render it necessary or proper I should make one appeal more to your Excellency's love of justice, and to your wish to preserve the harmony of the two countries; and, should this fail, I will then give up the idea of our remaining long in friendship and peace, and consider it as almost an impossible thing. I think your Excellency, in reading this letter, and recollecting circumstances, must view it in the same light, and will at least appreciate the motives which have given rise to it. Be assured that nothing but the pressing importance of the subject, and the difficulty of amicably receding from the point, to which the refusal or delay to ratify as it now is will bring us, would induce me to do so.

To show your Excellency that this opinion is too well founded, we have nothing to do but to go back and examine the conduct of Spain for six years, and we shall find that, during that time, there has been such a series of treatment to the vessels, cargoes, and in many instances persons of our citizens, as no man could believe, who has not an opportunity to examine the archives of our mission to this Court. The individual sufferings have been incredible, and the property lost of immense value. There is scarcely a part or a port of His Catholic Majesty's dominions in Europe and America, that has not been the scene and witness of their sufferings: Sufferings, such as I believe no people ever before endured from a nation to whose coasts they went under the solemn protection of treaties, the laws of nations, and, in many instances, express royal orders or permissions from the King. Nor was the unfriendly treatment of Spain confined only to the acts of her own subjects while we were in difference with France; contrary to the treaty and every principle of the law of nations, she permitted the French cruisers to carry in hundreds of our vessels, and proceed to their condemnation and sale in Spanish ports. If your Excellency will only throw your eye over the vast and melancholy pile of reclamations on these subjects now in your office, I have no doubt you will readily confess that there perhaps never existed such a collection of wrongs, sufferings, and damages, permitted by one nation toward another, with which she professed to be in peace and friendship. I will venture to say that it is such as no nation, having the same power to assert their rights and protect their citizens as we have, would have so long suffered without some kind of redress.
